

Leadership Circle Profile™

Interpretation Manual

Download Interactive PDF

LEADERSHIP
CIRCLE®

Download Interactive PDF

Introduction to the Leadership Circle Profile

Congratulations! You are participating in the most comprehensive leadership assessment system available. The Leadership Circle Profile is unique for two reasons. First, we all know that great leadership is a complex mix of competency and inner states of being. This is the first competency tool to measure both the inner and outer aspects of leadership. Second, your report is much more than just a list of behavioral competencies. It is organized into a very powerful system for understanding human behavior and development, as well as for making sense of the interrelationships between the many dimensions of your self that are being evaluated.

All your results are profiled in one large circular graph. This is to symbolize wholeness— your wholeness. We start with the assumption that you are a marvelously complex and beautifully integrated whole person. This Profile tries to do justice to that.

The Profile is arranged in a circle for another reason. It quickly shows how all of the dimensions integrate with each other. The interactions between dimensions are represented by their placement in the circle. These interactions will be referenced again and again throughout the report.

Layers of Analysis

- This report has two layers of analysis:
- Leadership Competencies
 - Internal Assumptions

Each layer has a great deal of information about your leadership and about your life.

The Leadership Circle Profile measures eighteen Leadership Competencies. These competencies have been well researched and shown to be the most critical behaviors and skill sets for leaders. You will be receiving feedback on how you assess yourself on these competencies and your scores will be compared with how other managers evaluate themselves on these same competencies.

The second layer of analysis measures internal assumptions. How we think, especially our habit of thought determines a great deal of our behavior. Behavioral habits, both effective and ineffective, are run by habits of thought. This Profile measures eleven Internal Assumptions that limit effectiveness. It is our experience in working with hundreds of managers, that over-extended and underutilized competencies, can usually be traced to self-limiting assumptions. As with the competency feedback, your self-assessment will be compared with how other managers evaluate their own thinking.

Please remember as you read that no instrument can measure the truth about you. Some of it will seem accurate. Some of it will seem inaccurate. Your job is to wade in and come up with a few key awarenesses that will positively influence your future development. To that end, think of the Leadership Circle Profile as a radar screen for discovering the most significant strengths and weaknesses that need attention at this point in your life.

LEADERSHIP CIRCLE PROFILE™

To understand the layout of the Profile Graphic, please read the following steps:

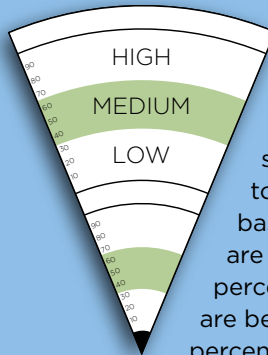

1 CIRCLE WITHIN A CIRCLE

The outer circle displays the results for each of the 29 dimensions measured by the LCP. The inner circle dimensions summarize the outer circle dimensions into 8 summary scores. Dimension definitions can be found on the following pages.

The location of dimensions within the circle illustrates the relationship between dimensions. Adjacent dimensions describe similar behavior patterns that are positively correlated. Dimensions on opposite sides of the circle are opposing behavior patterns and are inversely correlated.

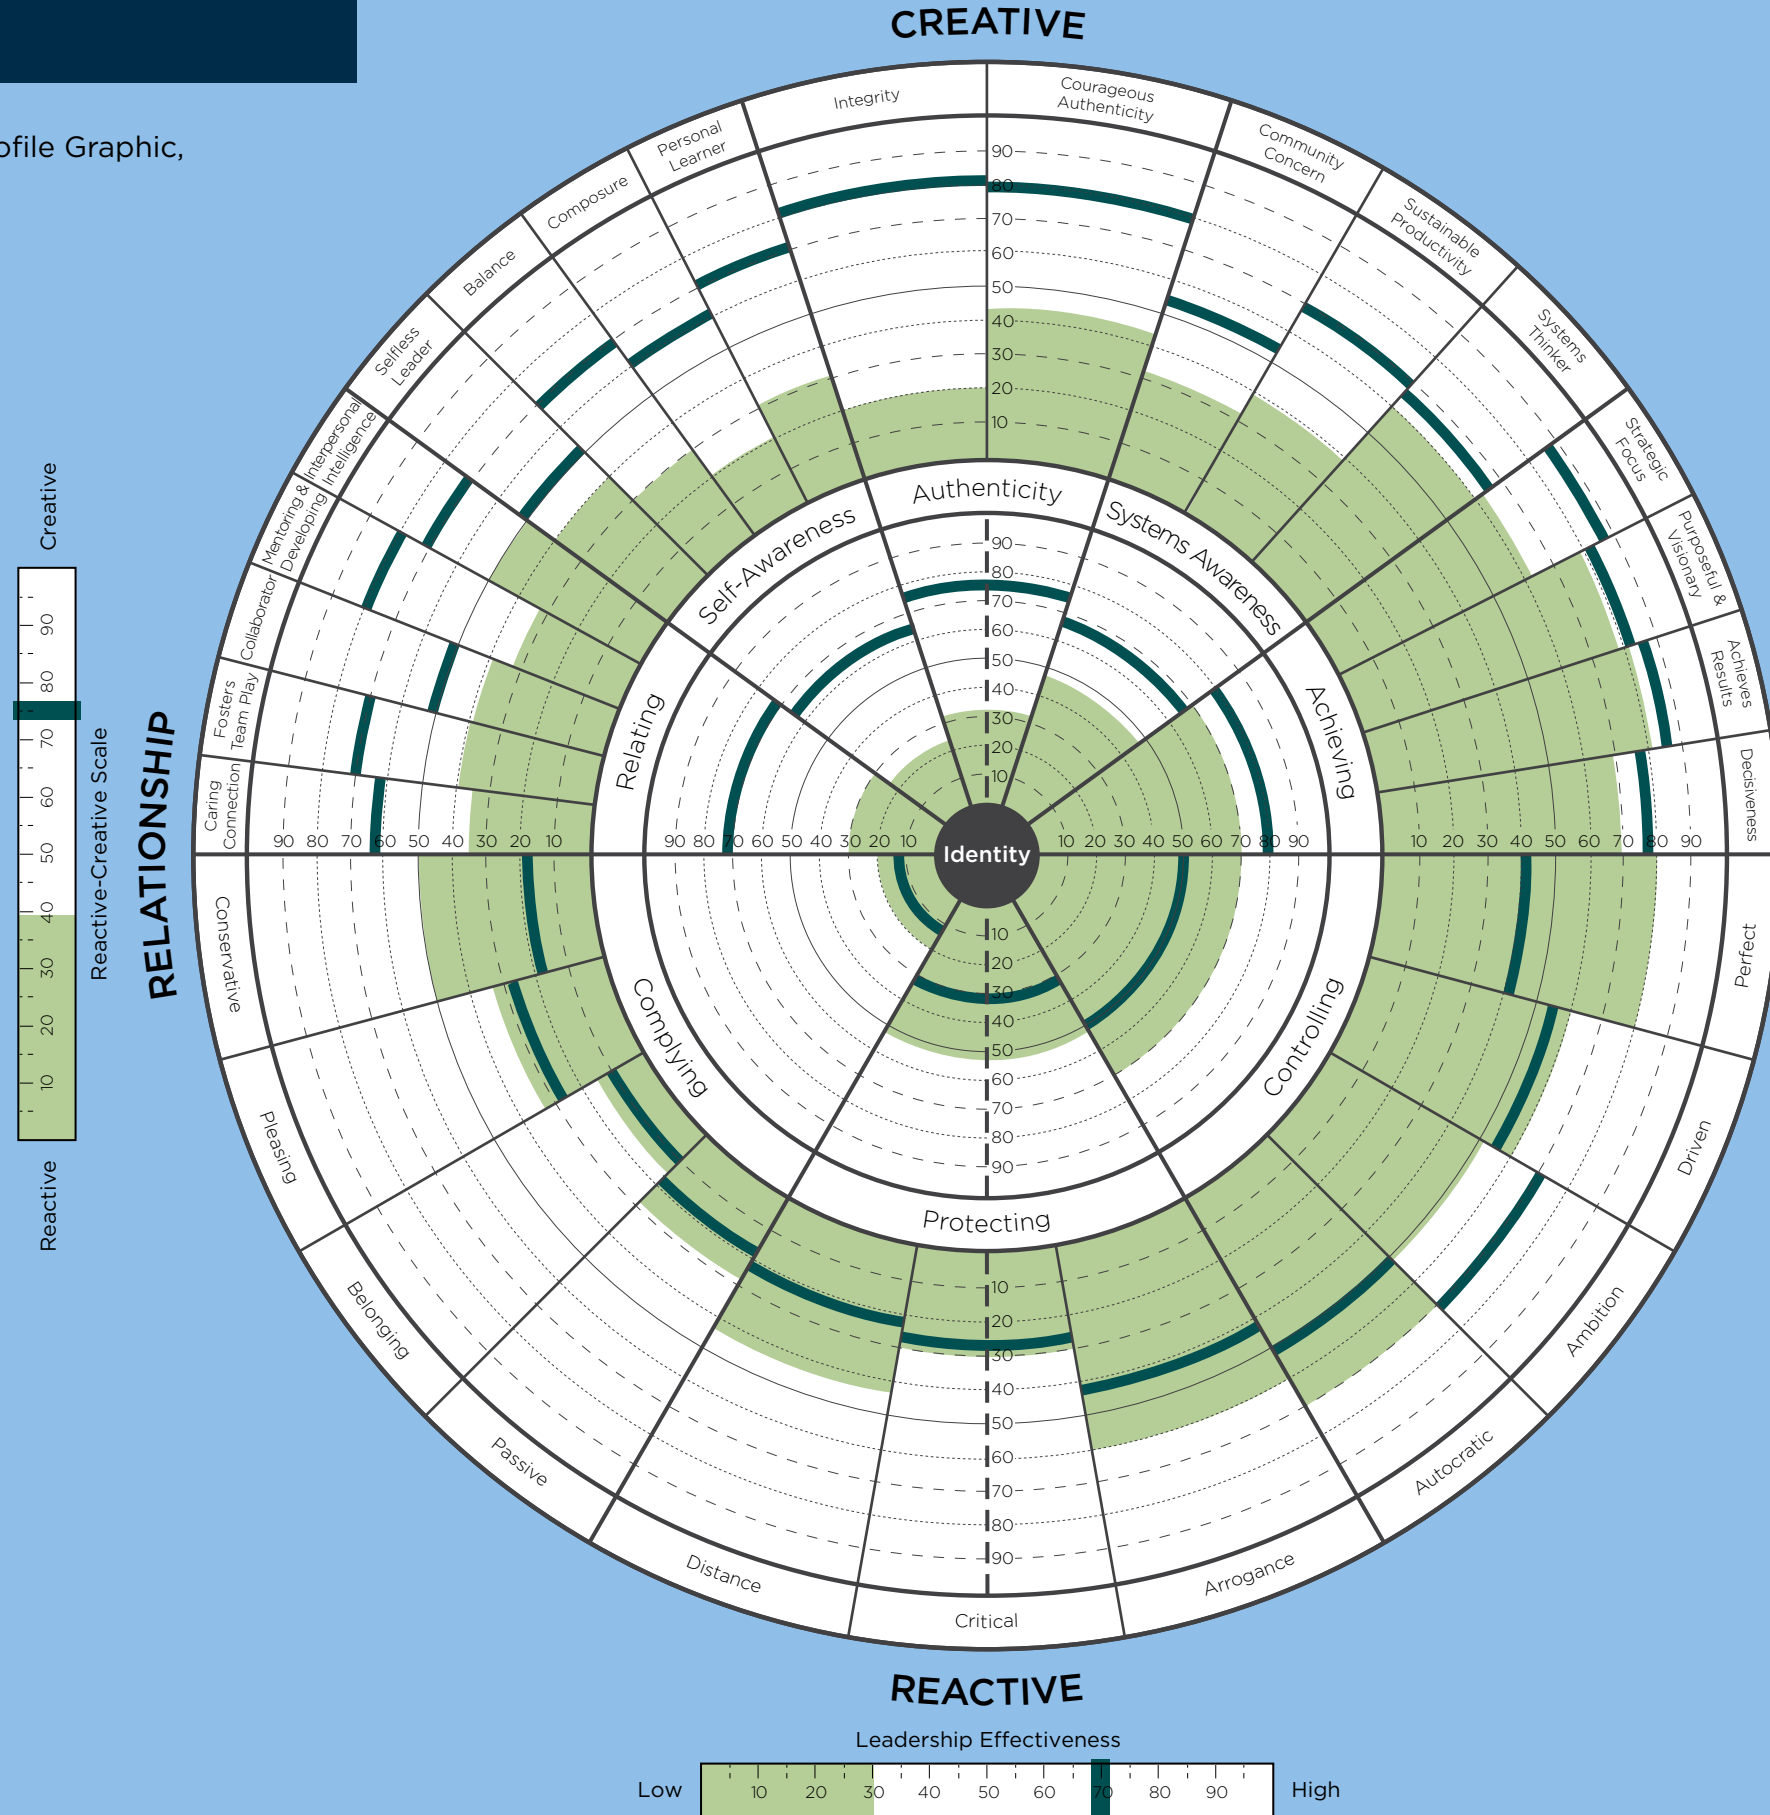

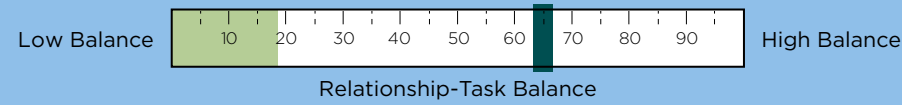

2 PERCENTILE SCORES

All scores are displayed as percentile scores compared to a global norm base. High scores are beyond the 66th percentile. Low scores are below the 33rd percentile.

3 KEY

Self Assessment
 Others' Assessment

4 SUMMARY DIMENSIONS

In addition to all the dimensions displayed in the inner and outer circle, the rectangular scales located around the circle are intended to bring everything together. They provide useful 'bottom-line' measures as well as measures of key patterns within the data.

Reactive-Creative Scale reflects the degree of balance between the Creative dimensions and the Reactive dimensions. The percentile score here gives the leader a sense of how he/she compares to other leaders with respect to the amount of energy he/she puts into Reactive versus Creative behaviors. It suggests the degree to which his/her leadership, relationships, and goal-oriented behaviors come out of a Creative or Reactive orientation. It also suggests the degree to which his/her self-concept and inner motivation come from within or are determined by external expectations, rules, or conditions.

Relationship-Task Balance measures the degree of balance a leader shows between the Achieving and Relating competencies. It is a measure of the over, under or balanced development of either half of the equation (the people half or the task half) that makes for great leadership.

Leadership Potential Utilization is a bottom line measure that compares the overall score of the dimensions measured to that of other leaders who have taken this survey. It sorts through all the high and low scores to answer the question, "So, in the end, how am I doing?"

Leadership Effectiveness measures the leader's perceived level of overall effectiveness. Research has shown it to be significantly correlated to business outcomes. It gives the leader an overall measure of how all of the above is translating into perceived effectiveness.

Understanding Your Graphic Profile

The Leadership Circle Profile is presented in a comprehensive graph. The inner circle displays eight dimensions. Each of these dimensions is a summary score for the dimensions in the outer circle. Understanding the circle is the key to integrating all the information contained in your leadership survey.

What do the numbers mean? All scales display a percentile score—that is, how you compare to a large group of other managers who have used this survey. Low scores are close to the center and higher scores radiate further out from the center.

How do I determine if a score is high or low? Scores above 66% are to be considered high, and scores below 33% are to be considered low. Any scores that fall between 33% to 66% suggest that you will need to do some reflection on which aspects of high descriptions apply to you and which aspects of low descriptions apply as well.

What do these dimensions measure? The definitions of the dimensions measured by your Profile are described below. A more extensive description will follow.

Dimension Definitions

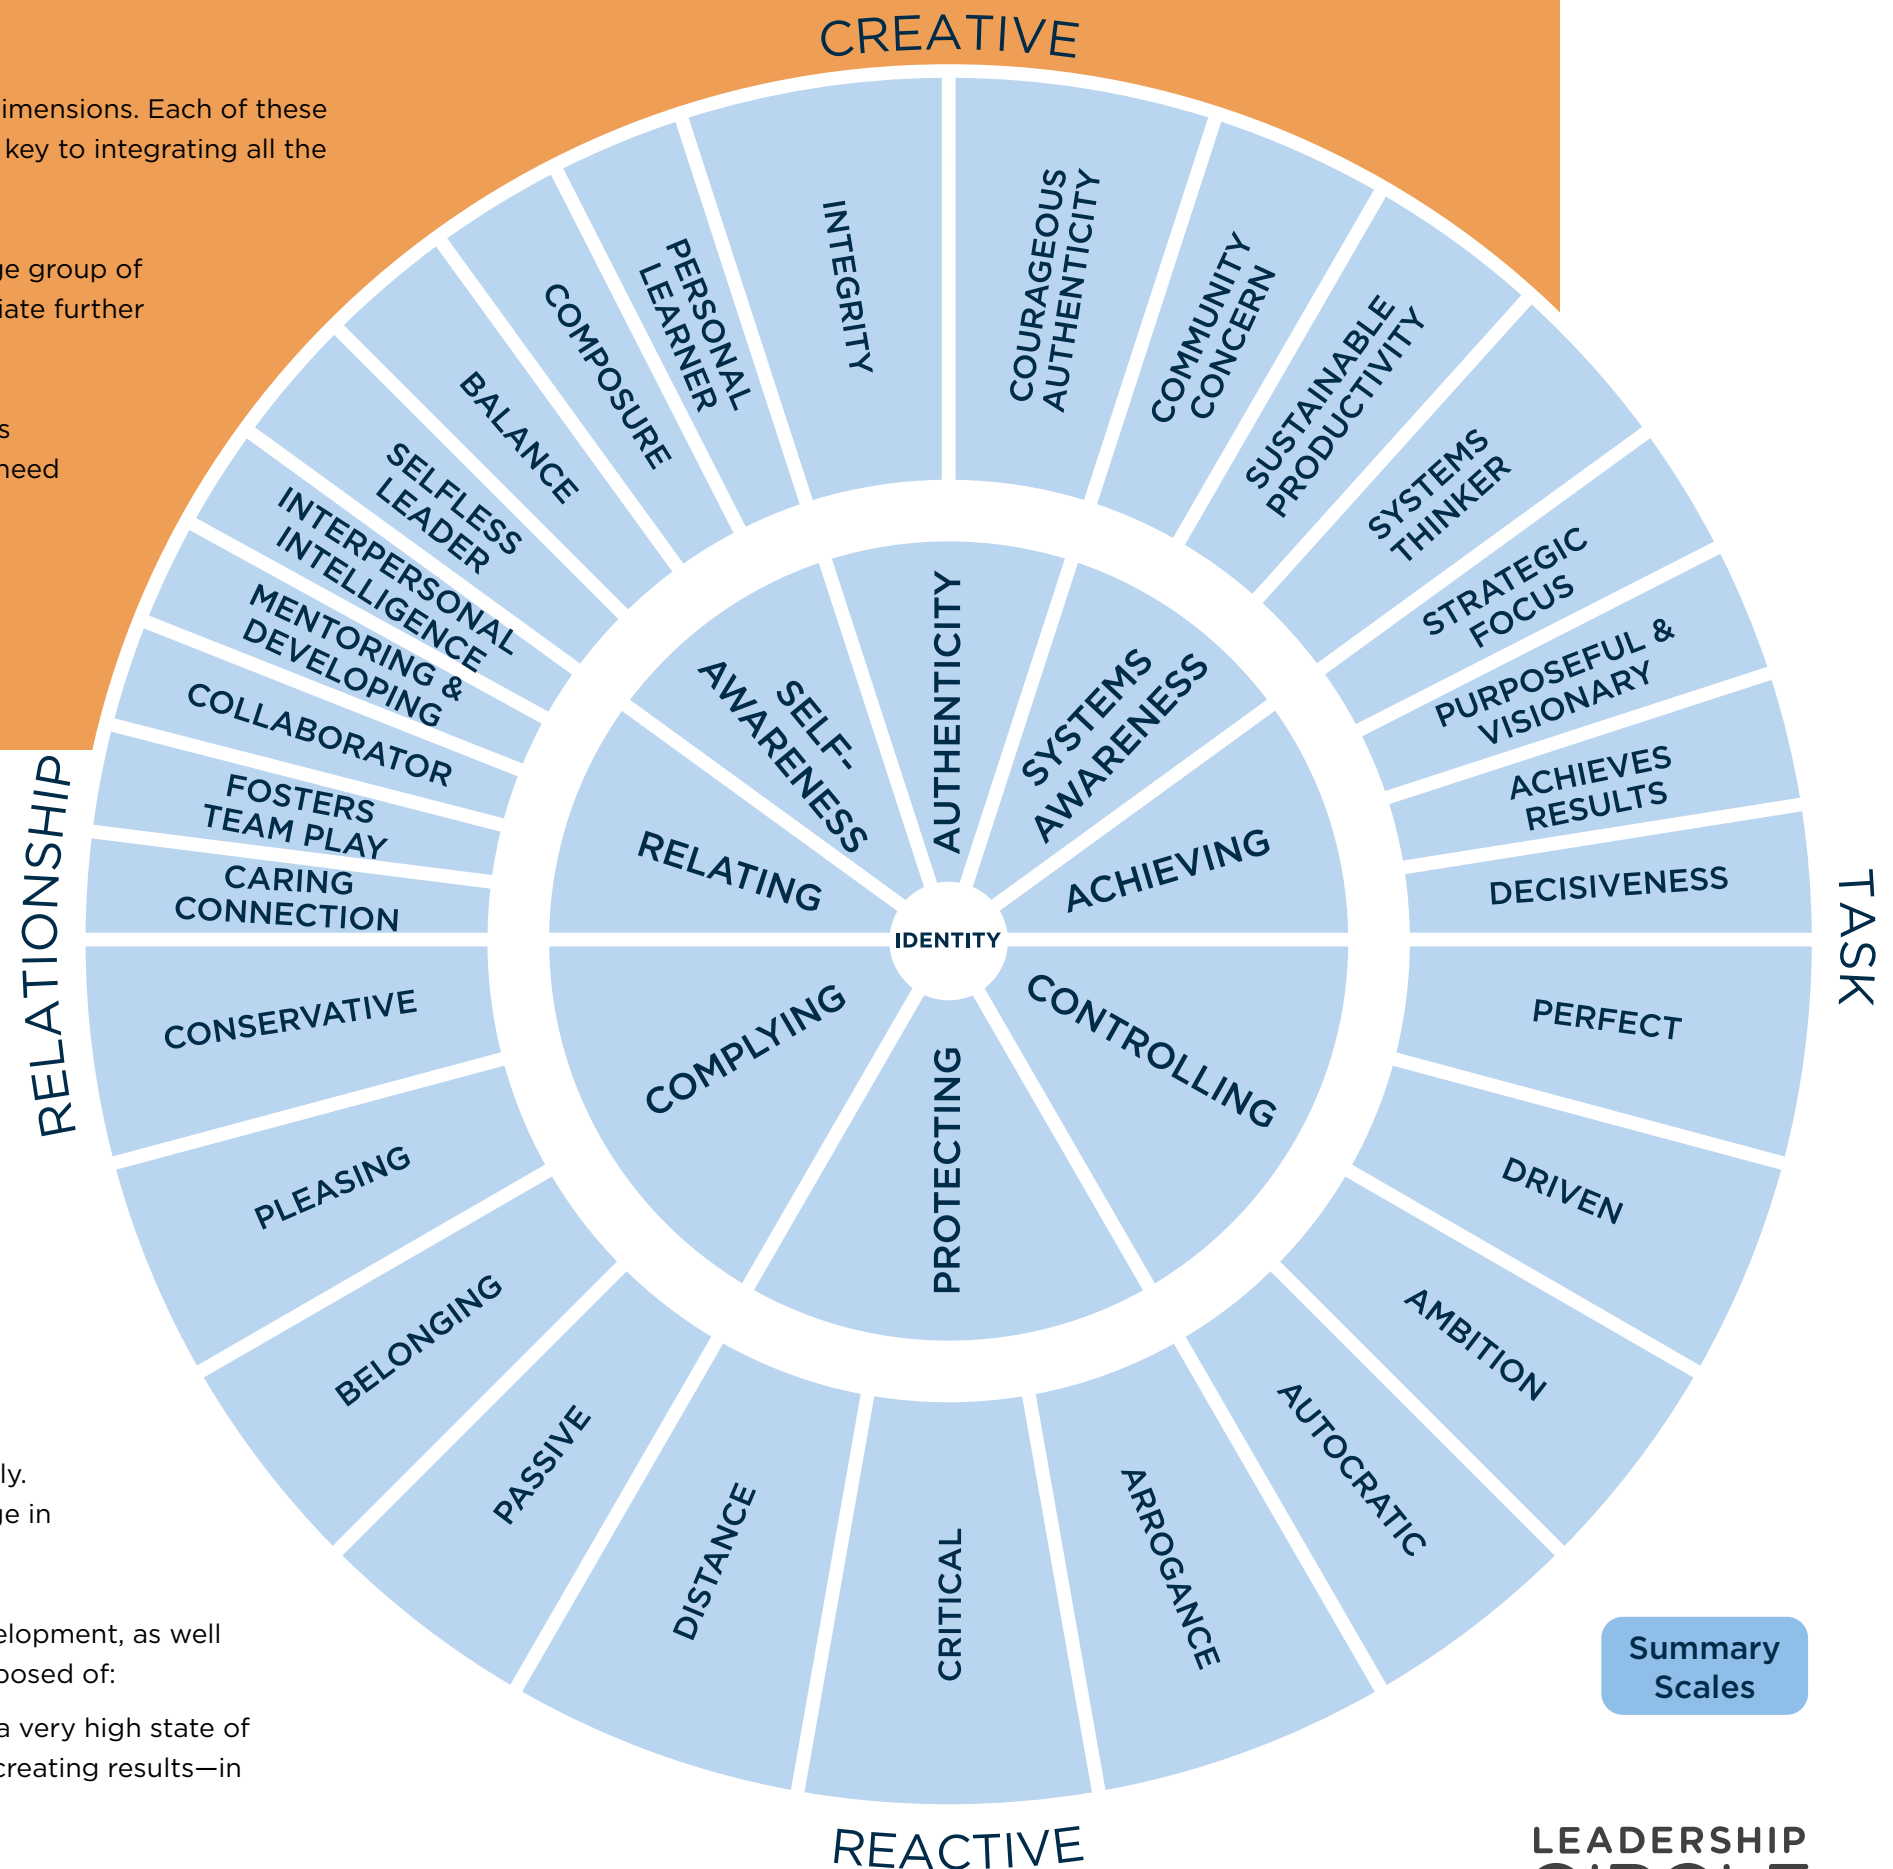

THE CREATIVE LEADERSHIP COMPETENCIES measure key behaviors and internal assumptions that lead to high fulfillment, high achievement leadership.

The Relating Dimension measures your capability to relate to others in a way that brings out the best in people, groups and organizations. It is composed of:

- Caring Connection measures your interest in and ability to form warm, caring relationships.
- Fosters Team Play measures your ability to foster high-performance teamwork among team members that report to you, across the organization, and within teams in which you participate.
- Collaborator measures the extent to which you engage others in a manner that allows the parties involved to discover common ground in conflict situations, find mutually beneficial agreements, develop synergy, and create win-win situations.
- Mentoring & Developing measures your ability to develop others through mentoring, maintain growth enhancing relationships, and help people grow and develop personally and professionally.
- Interpersonal Intelligence measures the interpersonal effectiveness with which you listen, engage in conflict and controversy, deal with the feelings of others, and manage your own feelings.

The Self-Awareness Dimension measures your orientation to ongoing professional and personal development, as well as the degree to which inner self-awareness is expressed through high integrity leadership. It is composed of:

- Selfless Leader measures the extent to which you pursue service over self-interest. It measures a very high state of personal awareness where the need for credit and personal ambition is far less important than creating results—in collaborative relationships—which serve a common good.

- Balance measures your ability, in the midst of the conflicting tensions of modern life, to keep a hearty balance between business and family, activity and reflection, work and leisure.
- Composure measures your ability, in the midst of conflict and high-tension situations, to remain composed and centered, and to maintain a calm, focused perspective.
- Personal Learner measures the degree to which you demonstrate a strong and active interest in learning, personal and professional growth.

The Authenticity Dimension measures your capability to relate to others in an authentic, courageous, and high integrity manner. It is composed of:

- Integrity measures how well you adhere to the set of values and principles that you espouse; that is, how well you can be trusted to “walk your talk.”
- Courageous Authenticity measures your willingness to take tough stands, bring up the “un-discussibles” (risky issues the group avoids discussing), and openly deal with difficult relationship problems.

The Systems Awareness Dimension measures the degree to which your awareness is focused on whole system improvement and on community welfare (the symbiotic relationship between the long-term welfare of the community and the interests of the organization). It is composed of:

- Community Concern measures the service orientation from which you lead. It measures the extent to which you link your legacy to service of community and global welfare.
- Sustainable Productivity measures your ability to achieve results in a way that maintains or enhances the overall long term effectiveness of the organization.
- Systems Thinker measures the degree to which you think and act from a whole system perspective as well as the extent to which you make decisions in light of the long-term health of the whole system.

The Achieving Dimension measures the extent to which you offer visionary, authentic, and high achievement leadership. It is composed of:

- Strategic Focus measures the extent to which you think strategically.
- Purposeful & Visionary measures the extent to which you clearly communicate and model commitment to personal purpose and vision.
- Achieves Results measures the degree to which you are goal directed and have a track record of goal achievement and high performance.
- Decisiveness measures your ability to make decisions on time, and the extent to which you are comfortable moving forward in uncertainty.

THE REACTIVE LEADERSHIP STYLES reflect inner beliefs that limit effectiveness, authentic expression, and empowering leadership.

The Controlling Dimension measures the extent to which you establish a sense of personal worth through task accomplishment and personal achievement. It is composed of:

- Perfect is a measure of your need to attain flawless results and perform to extremely high standards in order to feel secure and worthwhile as a person.
- Driven is a measure of the extent to which you are in overdrive.

- Ambition measures the extent to which you need to get ahead, move up in the organization, and be better than others.
- Autocratic measures your tendency to be forceful, aggressive, and controlling.

The Protecting Dimension measures the belief that you can protect yourself and establish a sense of worth through withdrawal, remaining distant, hidden, aloof, cynical, superior, and/or rational. It is composed of:

- Arrogance measures your tendency to project a large ego--behavior that is experienced as superior, egotistical, and self-centered.
- Critical is a measure of your tendency to take a critical, questioning, and somewhat cynical attitude.
- Distance is a measure of your tendency to establish a sense of personal worth and security through withdrawal, being superior and remaining aloof, emotionally distant and above it all.

The Complying Dimension measures the extent to which you get a sense of self-worth and security by complying with the expectations of others rather than acting on what you intend and want. It is composed of:

- Conservative measures the extent to which you think and act conservatively, follow procedure, and live within the prescribed rules of the organization with which you are associated.
- Pleasing measures your need to seek others' support and approval in order to feel secure and worthwhile as a person.
- Belonging measures your need to conform, follow the rules, and meet the expectations of those in authority.
- Passive measures the degree to which you give away your power to others and to circumstances outside your control.

SUMMARY MEASURES

The following dimensions are intended to bring everything together. They summarize all of the above into a few useful measures.

- Reactive-Creative Scale reflects the degree of balance between the creative dimensions and the reactive dimensions. The percentile score here gives you a sense of how you compare to other managers with respect to the amount of energy you put into reactive versus creative behavior. It suggests the degree to which your leadership, relationships, and goal oriented behaviors are coming out of a creative or reactive orientation. It also suggests the degree to which your self concept and inner motivation come from within or are determined by external expectations, rules, or conditions. Good balance results in high percentile scores.
- Relationship-Task Balance measures the degree of balance you show between the achievement competencies and the relationship competencies. It is a measure of the over, under, or balanced development of either half of the equation (the people half or the task half) that makes for great leadership. Good balance results in high percentile scores.
- Leadership Potential Utilization is a bottom line measure that compares the overall score of the dimensions measured to that of other leaders who have taken this survey. It sorts through all the high and low scores to answer the question, “So, in the end, how am I doing?”
- Leadership Effectiveness measures the leader’s perceived level of overall effectiveness. Research has shown it to be significantly correlated to business outcomes. It gives the leader an overall measure of how all of the above is translating into perceived effectiveness.

Interactions Within Your Profile

The circle is arranged to help you understand the interrelationships among all the dimensions. (These interactions are briefly described here and will be elaborated on in the more extensive dimension descriptions that follow.)

Dimensions that are opposite each other in the profile tend to be opposing behavioral patterns and internal assumptions. For example, Complying is opposite Achieving. Complying tends to reduce creativity and authenticity because the person is too concerned with having others like them. As a result, decisiveness, courage, and many of the other qualities that result in Achieving are diminished. In other words, high Complying scores tend to produce lower Achieving scores.

This same “oppositeness” is built into the entire profile. High Controlling scores tend to produce lower Relating scores. High Protecting scores are correlated to lower scores in Self-Awareness, Authenticity and Systems Awareness.

As you study the high and low patterns, you can immediately see how various dimensions are interacting.

In addition, the circle is laid out as a four-quadrant grid.

The top half of the circle maps Creative competencies that contribute to your effectiveness. The lower half of the circle maps self-limiting Reactive assumptions. Stronger scores in the bottom half of the circle are related to weaker scores in the top half. This is because reactive self-limiting assumptions tend to reduce all the creative competencies.

The right half of the circle has to do with Task (getting the job done creatively and effectively). The left half of the circle has to do with the nature of your Relationships with people and groups. The goal here is good balance so that you can achieve results and develop people simultaneously.

The interaction between the upper and lower halves of the circle is summarized in the Reactive-Creative Scale score. The interaction between the right and left halves of the circle is summarized in the Relationship-Task Balance score. The meaning of these results is defined below:

- Reactive-Creative Scale reflects the degree of balance between the creative dimensions and the reactive dimensions.
- Relationship-Task Balance measures the degree of balance you show between the relationship competencies and the achievement competencies.
- Leadership Potential Utilization is a bottom line measurement of the overall scores.
- Leadership Effectiveness measures your perceived level of overall effectiveness as a leader.

The following pages provide a more in-depth description of all the dimensions outlined above.

The Relating Dimension

The Relating dimension measures your capability to relate to others in a way that brings out the best in people, groups, and organizations. Below is a brief summary of what your Relating results indicate.

If you score high

You are naturally inclined to help others reach their potential through individual and team development. By providing a supportive climate, you inspire others to strive and improve. You accept others for who they are and extend to them unconditional positive regard. You build and maintain close relationships. You value intimacy, openness, caring, and support. You have strong communication and interpersonal abilities. You establish collaboration, cooperation, and mutually rewarding relationships. You make an excellent team member and coach.

People flourish under your leadership. As a leader, you are a natural team and people developer. Relating is not a soft form of management, Complying is. You are perfectly capable of confronting and challenging others. You are able to do this in a way that makes the issue, not the person, the focus of the challenge. So, even though people may get tough feedback, they feel supported as a person.

You tend to move toward relationships, and have a bias for love and support not as a strategy to get others to like you (as indicated by a high Complying result), but because caring for and supporting others is a creative expression of who you are. It also brings you joy and satisfaction to be a part of a person or team's development. If you can support the growth and effectiveness of others, you believe there will be better results, relationships, and satisfaction.

Internal Assumptions

Internal Assumptions are the beliefs you use to organize your identity. They are the inner rules or beliefs that define how you see yourself and your relationship to the world. The Internal Assumptions often associated with the Relating dimension include:

- I am worthy whether people approve of me or not
- People are capable and trustworthy
- I unconditionally support others as they are
- I bring out the best in people
- I care about people for their sake, not as a way to get something from them
- People have unlimited potential
- Building people up is good for business

Behaviors

Behaviors are the external expression of your Internal Assumptions. The general behaviors associated with the Relating dimension include:

- Promoting high levels of motivation for teamwork
- Fostering open dialogue within the team
- Directly addressing issues that get in the way of team performance
- Building good rapport and high trust
- Respecting another's opinion even if you disagree with it
- Acting as a role model for open communication
- Helping people learn, improve, and change
- Being an effective coach and mentor
- Holding others accountable to set and reach goals
- Speaking openly in the presence of "authorities"
- Listening to and learning from subordinates

If you score medium

If your scores for the Relating dimension are in the medium range, then you will tend to express some of the behaviors and hold some of the internal assumptions described above. You may also be limited by some of the Reactive dimensions and thus show some of the tendencies described in the "If you score low" section below. You will need to read and reflect on the meaning of both high and low scores to find what aspects of each describe you.

If you score low

Scoring low on the Relating dimension can have serious implications for your leadership. The most successful leaders score high here. Please read about any high Reactive scores to explore how your internal assumptions may be blocking your Relating capacity.

Scoring low suggests that you are under performing. The behaviors associated with low scores in the Relating dimension include:

- Avoid sharing the positive feelings you have for others
- Keeping relationships at arm's length
- Offering more criticism than praise
- Taking over conversations or interrupting others
- Getting angry or defensive when people disagree with you
- Blaming others for your problems—expecting them to do most of the changing
- Withdrawing from conflict
- Making too many decisions yourself or providing too much direction
- Delegating too little
- Avoiding difficult performance discussions

Related Scores

Low scores on this dimension can be related to low scores all across the Creative sphere. Low Relating scores undercut high achievement and stem from low self-awareness. Consequently, low scores on this dimension may well show up as low scores on any of the Creative competencies. In addition, low scores on this scale are correlated with high scores in the Reactive sphere. High reactive scores tend to block or limit your capacity for honest trusting relationships, unconditional support, and individual and team empowerment. These limitations come from an internal insecurity such as not feeling worthy or loved, feeling rejected, not feeling needed, feeling alone and unprotected.

Caring Connection

The Caring Connection dimension measures your interest in and ability to form warm, caring relationships.

If you score high

Study any high performing group of people, and you will find that they genuinely care about each other. When people don't like each other or maintain strictly impersonal relationships, they simply don't work as well together as those who can be professional and deeply personal.

Scoring high on Caring Connection means that you genuinely care about others. People feel supported in your presence because you are open to high quality, trusting, caring relationships. You tend to accept others for who they are and communicate unconditional positive regard. You are willing to vulnerably share strengths and weakness, hopes and fears. Others tend to trust you with these same very human aspects of their selves.

Scoring high on Caring Connection suggests that you:

- Genuinely care about others and form warm and caring relationships
- Show empathy for the concerns and struggles of others
- Care how others feel
- Are happy for others when they succeed
- Discuss non-work problems with others
- Are compassionate
- Admit mistakes and personal weaknesses
- Are open about your feelings
- Establish warm and genuine relationships
- Connect deeply with others
- Genuinely want to get to know people
- Confront others supportively

If you score low

Scoring low on Caring Connection does not usually mean that you don't care about others. Very few people are genuinely uncaring. Low scores on this dimension usually mean that you maintain a safe distance from people. You keep your guard up to protect yourself. In this way you remain defended.

The range of behavior that results when Caring Connection scores are low range from keeping relationships strictly technical/professional, to being cold and unfeeling. While this relational strategy may protect you, the cost is high. First, it results in diminished organizational performance. People simply work harder and more efficiently when their relationships are genuinely caring. Second, research suggests that caring relationships reduce stress and promote health and well-being. So, it is in your interest to take a look at what prevents you from deeper, more caring relationships. Do you:

- Keep conversations polite, technical, or mental?
- Guard against disclosing how you feel?
- Share the positive feelings you have for others?
- Let people know when you think they are doing well?
- Have personal, non-business conversations?
- Keep relationships at arm length?
- Offer more criticism than praise?
- Trust others?
- Show people the real you or the game face?

Low scores on Caring Connection usually mean that you protect yourself from the vulnerability of getting close to someone. It is a way of establishing or protecting your sense of self worth and/or security. Look for any high scores on the Reactive dimensions of this survey that may be at the root of this issue.

Fosters Team Play

Fosters Team Play measures your ability to foster high-performance teamwork among team members that report to you, across the organization, and within teams in which you participate.

If you score high

You lead and participate within groups in a way that promotes high levels of teamwork, cooperation, spirit, and synergy. This ability extends to collaborative efforts that cross function.

It is likely that the people who report to you consider the quality of their teamwork to be a very positive aspect of their job and one that contributes greatly to the success of the group. Your leadership paves the way for this and sets an example for others to follow. High scores on this dimension suggest that you use some of the following capabilities:

- Create a positive climate that supports people doing their best
- Promote high levels of motivation for teamwork
- Invite input from others
- Foster open honest dialogue within the team
- See success in terms of the whole team's success—not star players
- Understand and pick-up on group dynamics
- Deal effectively with all races, classes, ages, and genders
- Directly address issues that get in the way of team performance
- Share leadership among team members
- Work to find common ground and create win-win solutions
- Are a cooperative team player, but not a “yes” person
- Encourage collaboration within and between teams/departments

If you score low

Scoring low on Fosters Team Play suggests a few possibilities. It may mean that you do not manage a team or participate in one. It may mean that you lack the training to manage teams effectively. It could also mean that you lead in ways that shut down teamwork.

The ability to foster teamwork is a highly specialized skill. Many managers are often promoted because of their success as an individual contributor. Many entrepreneurs are successful because of their individual creativity and talent. With growth, success, and promotion comes ever-increasing complexity and, thus, the need to creatively utilize the collective intelligence of others. If you are continuing to lead out of the behavior set that made you successful as an individual, it is likely that your leadership style is thwarting the group's ability to succeed. Scoring low here strongly suggests this possibility.

There can be many reasons why a person inhibits teamwork. One can limit team effectiveness by providing too much control or not enough. Look over the lists below. You may be doing some of the following.

Are you providing too much control by:

- Making too many of the decisions with too little involvement of team members?
- Providing too much direction—not facilitating the group to set their own direction?
- Not delegating, or delegating, but continuing to tell the person what to do or how to do it?
- Playing favorites?
- Shutting down communication through aggressive tactics?
- Dealing indirectly with team or interpersonal issues, so as to reduce trust and openness?
- Not having clear goals, roles, responsibilities, and accountabilities?

Are you not providing enough control by:

- A lack of decisiveness?
- Not providing enough direction and letting the group remain adrift?
- Delegating without enough structure, support and guidance for the person to be effective?
- Avoiding or smoothing over team/interpersonal conflict?
- Trying too hard to please everyone?

Collaborator

Collaborator measures the extent to which you engage others in a manner that allows the parties involved to discover common ground in conflict situations, find mutually beneficial agreements, develop synergy, and create win-win solutions.

If you score high

Scoring high on Collaborator suggests that you lead through alignment. You work to establish common ground for agreement and shared vision. While you work in competitive environments, you do not act competitively. Instead, you build teams naturally and create win-win relationships. You balance self-interest with the best interest of others. You consistently listen to other perspectives and value them, even if you disagree. As a result, you encourage a healthy exchange of ideas. You look for the synergy between conflicting ideas and synthesize them into innovative solutions that serve the needs of all interested parties.

Collaboration is a critical capability. It is highly correlated with success in leadership. Successful leaders have the unique ability to take strong positions and yet remain open to differing perspectives. This openness is not just so others feel better about the interaction. This openness stems from the conviction that, “two (or more) heads are better than one.” You listen to understand and be influenced—have your opinion changed. This allows you to create win-win solutions, and to negotiate for the best interest of all parties involved. It allows you to create alignment among key stakeholders toward common vision and strategic initiatives.

High scores on Collaborator suggest that you have some of the following capabilities. You:

- Work to find common ground and create win-win solutions
- Are a cooperative team player, but not a “yes” person
- Encourage collaboration within and between teams/departments
- Negotiate for the best interest of both parties
- Create win-win relationships and agreements
- Are willing, but do not need to be the one in charge
- Listen well to differing points of view
- Are open to being influenced even when you have a clearly formed opinion
- See opportunities for synergy when others might not

If you score low

Scoring low on Collaborator means that you do not engage others in a way that gets the results described above. Instead, you tend to engage others in a win-lose manner where your opinion is paramount. Others’ opinions are not well listened to or taken seriously. It may be that you think you know best. It may be that you engage critically or autocratically and shut down conversation. It may be that you lack the interpersonal skills to be an effective collaborator. It may be that you don’t take a position or too easily give up your position in the name of collaboration. Look to the bottom half of the Profile to learn more about the specific behaviors that interrupt collaboration.

Scoring low on Collaborator generally means, either that you do not actively encourage collaboration, or that you engage in behaviors that discourage it. Lacking collaboration will limit your leadership. People may follow you, but it is more likely to be out of compliance than commitment. You will tend to limit the amount of synergy that is allowed to develop on the groups in which you are associated. This means that possibilities for breakthrough solutions get limited. The group settles for suboptimal results, or they persist in going after high-performance with you as an obstacle. This does not mean that you do not have very positive qualities that you bring to conversations, but it does suggest that you offer your strengths in a way that makes it difficult for others to offer their strengths.

Scoring low on Collaborator suggests that you may do some of the following:

- Enter conflicts with the motive to win
- Treat others’ positions as if they are invalid
- Give off the sense that you are right and others do not have that much to contribute
- Put other people down for their contribution
- Make decisions in isolation—not involving others in key decisions
- Gather peoples’ input into a decision after your mind is made up
- Remain difficult to influence—when your mind is made-up, the discussion is essentially over
- Negotiate with self-interest as your primary motive and outcome
- Listen poorly, such that others feel unheard and not taken seriously
- Act as an individual contributor conducting analyses, producing reports, and making decisions alone

Mentoring & Developing

Mentoring & Developing measures your ability to develop others through mentoring, and maintaining growth enhancing relationships. Mentoring is the ability to help people grow and develop personally and professionally. It results from a genuine interest in seeing another develop/improve. It also requires a good deal of interpersonal skill.

If you score high

People who work for/with you develop personally and professionally. You possess and actively use the ability to promote the development of others. You spend time and energy on activities that develop others. You are the kind of person under whom people flourish. You most likely hold meetings with your employees that help them learn, solve their own problems, improve their performance at work, prepare for advancement, set and achieve work/career goals.

You trust people to perform and you delegate tasks to promote learning. You empower others to make their own decisions, which means you share leadership. In this way, the capabilities of those who work for you are continually enhanced.

This does not mean you are soft on people—quite the opposite. You see what people are capable of achieving, you help them set high expectations for themselves, and you hold them accountable for high performance. You provide regular feedback. You probably give more positive feedback than negative, but you do not shy away from difficult performance discussions. You are able to be critical in a way that makes others feel both challenged and supported. They know you won't settle for less than their best, but they also know you want them to succeed.

Scoring high on Mentoring & Developing indicates that you:

- Hold frequent development discussions
- Are aware of the learning and career goals of each of your direct reports
- Helps those that work for you create and implement development plans
- Are an effective coach and mentor
- Accept people as they are
- Help people learn, improve, and change
- Trust people to perform
- Delegate both routine and important tasks
- Are willing to share responsibility and accountability
- Empower others
- Encourage direct reports to take on challenging assignments and developmental opportunities

If you score low

Low scores on Mentoring & Developing mean that the people who work for you are being held back by the way you interact with them. It does not mean that you do not care about their development (although this may be the case) it means that you may lack the interpersonal skill to engage others in a growth enhancing way. It may also mean that you spend more time on the technical side of your job and neglect the human aspects.

This is a critical competency for success in leadership. It is one you simply must learn. Not to learn it, increases the likelihood that your best people will leave you; that the people who work for you will not perform up to their capability; that you will be overburdened with too much to do because others cannot perform at a level that is required for success.

You may be blaming others for their poor performance while failing to provide the support they need to enhance their capability. Lack of support can take many forms. Reflect on the list below. Are you:

- Uncomfortable with your ability to mentor others?
- Being overly critical?
- Delegating too little?
- Avoiding difficult performance discussions?
- Providing too little feedback?
- Solving people's problems for them?
- Making decisions for which others are responsible?
- Needing to expand your interpersonal skills?
- More focused on the technical side of the job rather than the people side?

Interpersonal Intelligence

Interpersonal Intelligence is a measure of your interpersonal skills. It measures the effectiveness with which you listen, engage in conflict and controversy, deal with the feelings of others, and manage your own feelings.

If you score high

Scoring high on Interpersonal Intelligence means, first and foremost, that you listen well. It also means you continue to listen well when a meeting heats up. Good listeners seek first to understand the other's position and treat it with respect even if they disagree strongly. You ask good questions that help to draw out the other person's position and feelings. You do not react defensively to the critical comments of others, but remain in a listening mode.

As a good listener, you are skilled at the ability to convey what you have heard, such that the other person feels understood. You paraphrase what the other has said in a way that they know you get what they are trying to say. You do this in a way that is respectful.

You are effective in dealing with conflict/disagreement. Conflict, more often than not, results in both win-win outcomes and in enhanced trust. You are able to strongly advocate your position and do so in a way that respects diversity of opinion. In highly conflictual situations you remain respectful and do not withdraw or resort to putting others down.

You are able to deal well with the emotional content of workplace relationships. Peoples' feelings are welcome around you—both positive and negative. This means that you have good command of your own feelings. When others are critical of you, you do not take it personally and react with defensive behavior. Instead you stay productively engaged with the other person. You are also able to give and receive emotional support.

Scoring high on Interpersonal Intelligence indicates that you:

- Are easy to approach and talk to
- Build good rapport with other people
- Are a good listener
- Seek first to understand the other's position
- Demonstrate that you understand the other person by articulating the other's position
- Behave effectively in high conflict situations
- Do not react defensively when confronted, challenged, or criticized
- May feel anger, but deal with it effectively
- Are willing to bring up risky issues
- Bring up controversial issues in a respectful way
- Respect another's opinion, even if you disagree with it
- Build and maintain high trust relationships

- Listen with acceptance to another's concerns, doubts, fears, and anxieties
- Build mutually supportive and effective relationships
- Diffuse high-tension situations without evading the issue
- Are honest and direct in all interactions
- Easily gain the trust, respect, and support of others

If you score low

Scoring low on Interpersonal Intelligence could mean either that you lack certain skill training or that you are reacting defensively with counterproductive behavior. Of course, both could be going on.

In our culture, we have learned a way of conducting conversations that looks very much like debate—long on advocating one's own position, short on listening. If you scored low on this dimension, it is likely that you need to learn how to balance advocating your own position with listening to others. Lack of listening communicates a lack of respect. It is a put-down to the people around you. While this may not be your intent, it is the effect of not taking the time to genuinely listen to another's position.

Scoring low, you may also tend to react defensively in interpersonal situations. Defensive behavior can take many forms from outright angry attack, to complete withdrawal. You will need to study this survey, and get feedback from people who will tell you the truth, to get a clear picture of the forms your defensive behavior may be taking.

Defensive action usually results when you feel threatened or hurt. It suggests your sense of self-esteem is connected to what other people are saying or doing. Scoring low on Interpersonal Intelligence suggests that you may be behaving in some of the following ways. Are you:

- Telling people what to do too often?
- Taking over conversations?
- Getting angry or difficult when people disagree?
- Asking questions that are really statements: "but don't you think that...?"
- Interrupting others and cutting them off?
- Trying to win every debate?
- Putting people down?
- Withdrawing from conflict?
- Smoothing over conflict or masking it with humor?
- Talking about issues with others, and not directly to those involved?

“If your actions inspire others to dream more, learn more, do more and become more, you are a leader.”

~John Quincy Adams

The Self-Awareness Dimension

The Self-Awareness dimension measures your orientation to ongoing professional and personal development, as well as the degree to which inner self-awareness is expressed through balanced perspective and high integrity leadership. Below is a brief summary of what your Self-Awareness results indicate.

If you score high

Scoring high on Self-Awareness is a very positive indication. It suggests that you actively pursue and value personal and professional development. You are an alive and vital person. Having developed your sense of purpose, you act from your internal center, consciously expressing your core values. You are trusted to “walk your talk” and people respect you as someone who acts with integrity.

Your sense of self-esteem is based on an inherent appreciation of life as a journey of learning and development. You are not perfect (and accept that). In fact, you know even more clearly than most about your imperfections. You are making peace with your imperfections. You know that you are a mix of strength and weakness, light and dark. You are less likely to deny the weak and the undeveloped parts in yourself. You accept that these aspects are there, admit when you make mistakes or hurt others, and use these experiences to improve. You are becoming less defensive when others criticize you. You have less to defend because you see more of the full complexity of yourself. This frees you to engage others more powerfully and compassionately.

You have less of a need to get your sense of self-esteem from having others look up to you or from your accomplishments. While you enjoy all this, it does not define you. Consequently, you lead in a way that strengthens the innate capabilities of those who work with you. You see in the weaknesses of others your own struggle to grow. Instead of judging them, you want to help them grow. Others’ talents or successes do not intimidate you. This allows you to surround yourself with very capable people and celebrate their achievements.

Internal Assumptions

Internal Assumptions are the beliefs you use to organize your identity. They are the inner rules or beliefs that define how you see your self and your relationship to the world. The Internal Assumptions often associated with the Self-Awareness dimension include:

- I am inherently worthy and secure
- My worth and security come from within and are not made up by how others see me, nor by how I perform
- Inner development is necessary for the full deployment of self
- Full expression of my creativity leads to a meaningful legacy
- I contain a mix of strengths and weaknesses, light and dark
- Self-acceptance is the key to accepting others
- When I find unacceptable parts in others—it points to aspects of myself for which I have not been willing to be fully responsible

Behaviors

Behaviors are the external expression of your Internal Assumptions. The general behaviors associated with the Self-Awareness dimension include:

- Composure under pressure
- Ability to balance the multiple demands that come with adult life
- Openness to feedback
- Giving direct, non-blaming feedback
- Admitting mistakes
- Using success and failure to further self-knowledge
- Laughing easily at your own idiosyncrasies
- Taking time to understand employees' personal motivations
- Taking time to understand your own personal motivations, strengths, and weaknesses

If you score medium

If your scores for the Self-Awareness dimension are in the medium range, then you will tend to express some of the behaviors and hold some of the internal assumptions described above. You may also be limited by some of the Reactive dimensions and thus show some of the tendencies described in the “If you score low” section below. You will need to read and reflect on the meaning of both high and low scores to find what aspects of each describe you.

If you score low

Scoring low on Self-Awareness suggests that you are holding back your leadership impact by not actively pursuing personal development. Your inner life and outer life are out of balance. You may not fully realize that the game of life is played from the inside out—that the external events and circumstances of life are mirrors reflecting one's inner level of self-awareness.

This results in a lessening of personal power—the kind of power that comes from personal integrity, deep engagement, inner vitality, and undefended openness.

Scoring low suggests that you are not in alignment with your self. The behaviors associated with low scores in the Self-Awareness dimension include:

- Not taking time for reflection and to know yourself
- Being caught in the rat-race of life, feeling out of balance with little time and space for yourself
- Reacting to life and problems rather than creating life as an expression of what matters most to you
- Defining your self in terms of others' expectations
- Blaming others for your problems—expecting them to do most of the changing
- Defending yourself, being slow to admit mistakes, ignoring failures and shortcomings
- Being harshly critical and demanding of yourself
- Playing out various roles in your life rather than acting from your authentic center

Related Scores

Low scores on Self-Awareness can be related to low scores all across the Creative sphere. All of the competencies that comprise effective leadership spring from an internal source of self-knowledge. Consequently, low scores on this dimension may well show up as low scores on any of the Creative competencies. In addition, low scores on this scale are correlated with high scores in the Reactive sphere. High Reactive scores tend to block or limit your capability to discover and lead from your own inner vitality and integrity. These behaviors come from an internal insecurity such as not feeling worthy or loved, feeling rejected, not feeling needed, feeling alone and unprotected.

Selfless Leader

Selfless Leader measures the extent to which you pursue service over self-interest. It measures a very high state of personal awareness where the need for credit and personal ambition is far less important than creating results—in collaborative relationships—which serve a common good.

If you score high

Scoring high on Selfless Leader suggests that you are a true servant leader. You see relationships as opportunities to serve. You are fully engaged and humble at the same time. You work from a position of equality and seek mutual benefits rather than personal reward. These attitudes extend to the willingness to share both leadership roles and credit for achievements.

Scoring high suggests a high level of personal development. You are authentic and becoming self-actualized and developing high levels of self-awareness and interpersonal skills. If this score is accurate about you, you know what you have gone through to become the kind of leader you are. You probably have been on a personal/spiritual development journey for some time. Along the way you have learned to face yourself, your gifts, and your shadows. As you have come into greater self-knowledge and acceptance, your self-esteem has become less and less tied to the external measures of success or the approval of others. You now live by your own internal principles. Beyond that, you have also come to accept that you are not perfect. You are learning to engage and accept the imperfect (even dark) parts of yourself. This is self-compassion, and as you grow in it you grow into genuine compassion for others. You are becoming more accepting, and are thereby, free to bring out the best in others.

Scoring high on Selfless Leader suggests that you may have a natural predisposition to achieving results with others. At your best, your work may seem effortless and produce results that are “magical.” This is because you are able to lead and/or participate in groups such that high synergy levels are possible. You bring out the true power (often lying dormant) of the group.

At times you may become frustrated with others who lack the skills or motivation to transcend self-interest for mutual benefit. Your collaboration needs to be supported by institutional structures and group norms that facilitate cooperation.

Your success is founded on the following orientations and practices. You:

- Are ego-less, that is you have strength of character without needing to be noticed
- Lead in ways that allows others to say, “we did it ourselves”
- Are relatively uninterested in personal credit
- Are slow to blame, quick to accept personal responsibility
- Know that you have both a light and dark side to yourself
- Seem as if collaboration is second nature—it comes naturally to you
- Are as interested in the welfare of others as your own welfare
- Are a servant leader
- Lead from a position of equality

If you score low

Since high scores measure a very high level of personal development, low scores on Selfless Leader may not be indicative of problems. If other scores in the Creative dimensions are high and this is low, it may represent an opportunity for growth, not a problem.

Leaders who take their personal development seriously can, in the long run, grow into a level of self-awareness that is no longer motivated by self-interest. Low scores here simply mean that you are still on the way to being a servant leader. It takes a long time and is an acquired taste.

You may see results as being best achieved through being in command or through winning. Valuing control, you may find it difficult to permit the group to take ownership of your initiatives or ideas. This could indicate that you fear losing the opportunity to gain credit. At the same time, you may find group work itself burdensome, preferring instead to find opportunities to excel individually.

A desire to be first or best can motivate success. However, such success can isolate if it isn't supported by the ability to explore mutual benefit with others.

- Can you recall the pleasure of working in a high performing group? What most contributed to your satisfaction and results?
- Can you find or design groups in which you can practice the role of contributor rather than leader?
- Can you identify opportunities for increased cooperation and partnership with others?
- Can you identify groups whose mission you support that might benefit from your service as a volunteer?

Balance

Balance measures your ability, in the midst of the conflicting tensions of modern life, to keep a healthy balance between business and family, activity and reflection, work and leisure. It measures your tendency to be self-renewing, and handle the stress of life without losing your self.

If you score high

You are able to maintain high performance in spite of stressful environments. You attain this by cultivating an inner equilibrium and by integrating and balancing the various aspects of your life.

For health, true balance is needed, including attention to adequate time for reflection, diet and physical exercise. Values are often in competition, producing divided attention to family and work life, leisure and career, duty to others and personal development, spontaneity and control. Conscious attention to physical well being, commitment to wholeness, and good time management are needed to avoid the damaging effects of stress. You recognize that for health, true balance is needed, including attention to adequate time for reflection, diet, and physical exercise.

Good balance aids you in remaining calm, considerate, and in making good decisions under pressure. You can also provide support for others in difficult times.

You are able to attain balance through the following orientations and practices:

- Keeping things in perspective
- Finding enough time for personal reflection and renewal
- Maintaining a healthy balance between work and family
- Maintaining a healthy balance between work and leisure
- Practicing good health habits (exercise and diet)
- Handling stress and pressure well
- Performance is high in stressful times
- Demonstrating a high level of maturity

If you score low

You may become a victim of stress and burnout. You may diminish your personal life in pursuit of work goals and undermine your physical health. A low Balance score simply indicates that you are working too much and too intensely. It may suggest that you have made work your life and are either neglecting other important aspects of your life (marriage, family, exercise, diet, personal/spiritual development), or that you simply do not invest energy in these things because work is playing such a dominant role.

Your leadership effectiveness, full human potential, and overall well being may depend upon balancing work with leisure, family with career, practice with reflection, and self-time with time spent in service to others.

You may wish to keep a time-diary for a week, recording not only your activities but also the values that motivate them. Consider the following questions:

- Do you find that you are doing what you most value?
- Do you pursue personal and professional growth?
- Are you balancing work with play?
- Do you have an activity outside of work that is both renewing and challenging?
- Do you make time for reflection and spiritual development?
- Do you spend too much time meeting obligations?
- Are you present for those you care about?

Composure

Composure measures your ability, in the midst of conflict and high-tension situations, to remain composed and centered, and to maintain a calm, focused perspective.

If you score high

You are able to maintain high performance in spite of stressful environments. You stay composed, calm and focused under pressure. You attain this inner equilibrium by taking a broader perspective and integrating the various aspects of the situation into workable solutions or strategies.

You have the ability to remain calm and considerate and to make good decisions under pressure, as well as to provide support for others in difficult times. It is an orientation to effective performance under stress that contributes to efficiency and to maintaining positive relationships in times of stress/conflict.

You are able to remain composed through the following orientations and practices:

- Keeping things in perspective
- Remaining composed under pressure
- Staying relaxed
- Staying present and open in pressured/conflicted situations
- Handling stress and pressure well
- Not making a quick/poor decision under pressure
- Not becoming defensive or overly emotional
- Performance is high in stressful times
- Not becoming hostile or sarcastic under stress
- Not withdrawing under pressure
- Demonstrating a high level of maturity
- Being a calming influence in difficult times
- Remaining calm without being naïve or aloof

If you score low

Under stress in the workplace you can act in ways that are inconsiderate of others. You are also less likely to make good decisions because you are less able to draw upon your full reserves of intelligence and experience. You often regress to previously learned behavior.

You may find that you become more hostile under stress or that you withdraw. Both are defenses that diminish your ability to make sense out of events and to provide leadership to others.

You may wish to keep a time-diary for a week, recording not only your activities but also the values that motivate them. Consider the following questions:

- Do you find that you are doing what you most value?
- Are you trying to do too much?
- Do you have a practice of reflecting on what you tell yourself is at risk when you lose composure?
- Do you have an activity outside of work that is both renewing and challenging?
- Do you have healthy ways to relieve stress?
- Do you spend too much time meeting obligations?
- Are you present for those you care about?

Personal Learner

Personal Learner measures the extent to which you demonstrate a strong and active interest in learning, personal and professional growth. It measures how actively and reflectively you pursue becoming all you are capable of being—growing in self-awareness, wisdom, knowledge, and insight.

If you score high

Personal learners are curious about the world and open to new experiences. Above all, they seek to know themselves. A high score in this area suggests that you welcome others' feedback and that you are committed to self-evaluation.

This kind of learning is more complete and demanding than mastering an academic discipline in isolation or auditing a single work process for improvement. It requires ongoing commitment and humility, the ability to be objective about ourselves. This kind of learning is carried out in relationships, so strong interpersonal skills are needed to accurately read verbal and nonverbal feedback from others and to develop a climate of trust in which such feedback is honest.

This kind of learning also happens by choosing experiences and practices that stimulate personal growth. These include reflective practices such as reading, reflecting, journaling, meditating, praying, etc. These practices help you make sense of your life, learn from your experience and find meaning in the moment-to-moment events of life. You may also engage in other disciplines such as yoga, massage, martial arts, and exercise. You may also seek out experiences which will deepen or expand you such as travel, attending a personal development workshop, volunteering, etc. In short you do things to keep yourself vibrant, alive, and growing.

Many organizations understand that individuals add value through the knowledge they bring and create. You provide such value, thriving in an environment where there is interesting work and the opportunity to learn new things. However, given the need to integrate ongoing learning and personal improvement, it's necessary that you set aside adequate time for reflection. The following is a list of orientations and practices that you may use to support your learning. You:

- Are committed to working to improve yourself
- Are aware of weaknesses and work to improve
- Know your strengths and weaknesses
- Seek out feedback about self
- Take time for reflection and personal learning
- Learn from mistakes
- Are curious about the nature of reality
- Notice when there is a need to change personal/managerial behavior
- Learn about yourself through observing others' reactions
- Are continuously and actively learning
- Are open to change
- Reflect on your successes and failures for self-improvement
- Love doing something new, unfamiliar, and challenging

If you score low

You may be cutting off opportunities for a more productive career and personal growth. Most studies of work satisfaction have concluded that greatest fulfillment is derived from learning. As a child you were naturally curious. You may have lost your zest for new things, and thereby lost an important contributor to personal and professional growth.

Have you defined success as improvement? The drive toward personal improvement is powerful in those who want to succeed. Success requires performance measures that permit learning from mistakes. Some feedback comes directly from performance, as in a golf score. More important is feedback from others. Do you seek out others' judgements of your performance for improvement (not just praise)?

Those who score low in personal learning are often afraid of receiving information about themselves from others. They invalidate others' suggestions for improvement because they see them as threats to self-esteem. Practice in giving and receiving feedback is essential to overcoming this barrier.

The Personal Learner dimension is critical to attaining maturity, remaining competent, flexible, and contributing. You might wish to reflect on the following questions:

- Do you have a trusted mentor or coach who can give you perspectives on your strengths and weaknesses?
- Do you give yourself time to explore new things?
- Have you identified groups with interests similar to your own that can provide resources and social interaction around learning?

- Do you take advantage of new learning technologies (Internet)?
- Do you belong to professional associations that offer new learning?
- Can you identify areas you would like to explore in your work or hobbies that might rekindle your interest?

“Leadership is enhancing the capacity of the organization to create what matters most.”

~Bob Anderson

The Authenticity Dimension

The Authenticity dimension measures your capability to relate to others in an authentic, courageous, and high integrity manner. It measures the extent to which your leadership is an expression of your true self—not masked by organizational politics, looking good, winning approval, etc. It also measures your ability to take tough stands, bring up the “un-discussibles” (risky issues the group avoids discussing), openly deal with relationship problems, and share personal feelings/vulnerabilities about a situation. Courage in the workplace involves authentically and directly dealing with risky issues in one-to-one and group situations. Below is a brief summary of what your Authenticity results indicate.

If you score high

Your inner and outer lives are congruent. Your behavior matches your values and others trust that you can be counted on to keep your word, meet your commitments, deal with them honestly and fairly, and remain true to your purpose.

Authenticity and integrity are the qualities most desired in a leader, so scoring high on Authenticity suggests that you are perceived as a leader, and that others will follow. They will align with you because you practice what you preach. Your power in the organization is not primarily based on where you are in the hierarchy (position power), nor does being indirectly political attain it. Your power is given to you by others because you act with integrity.

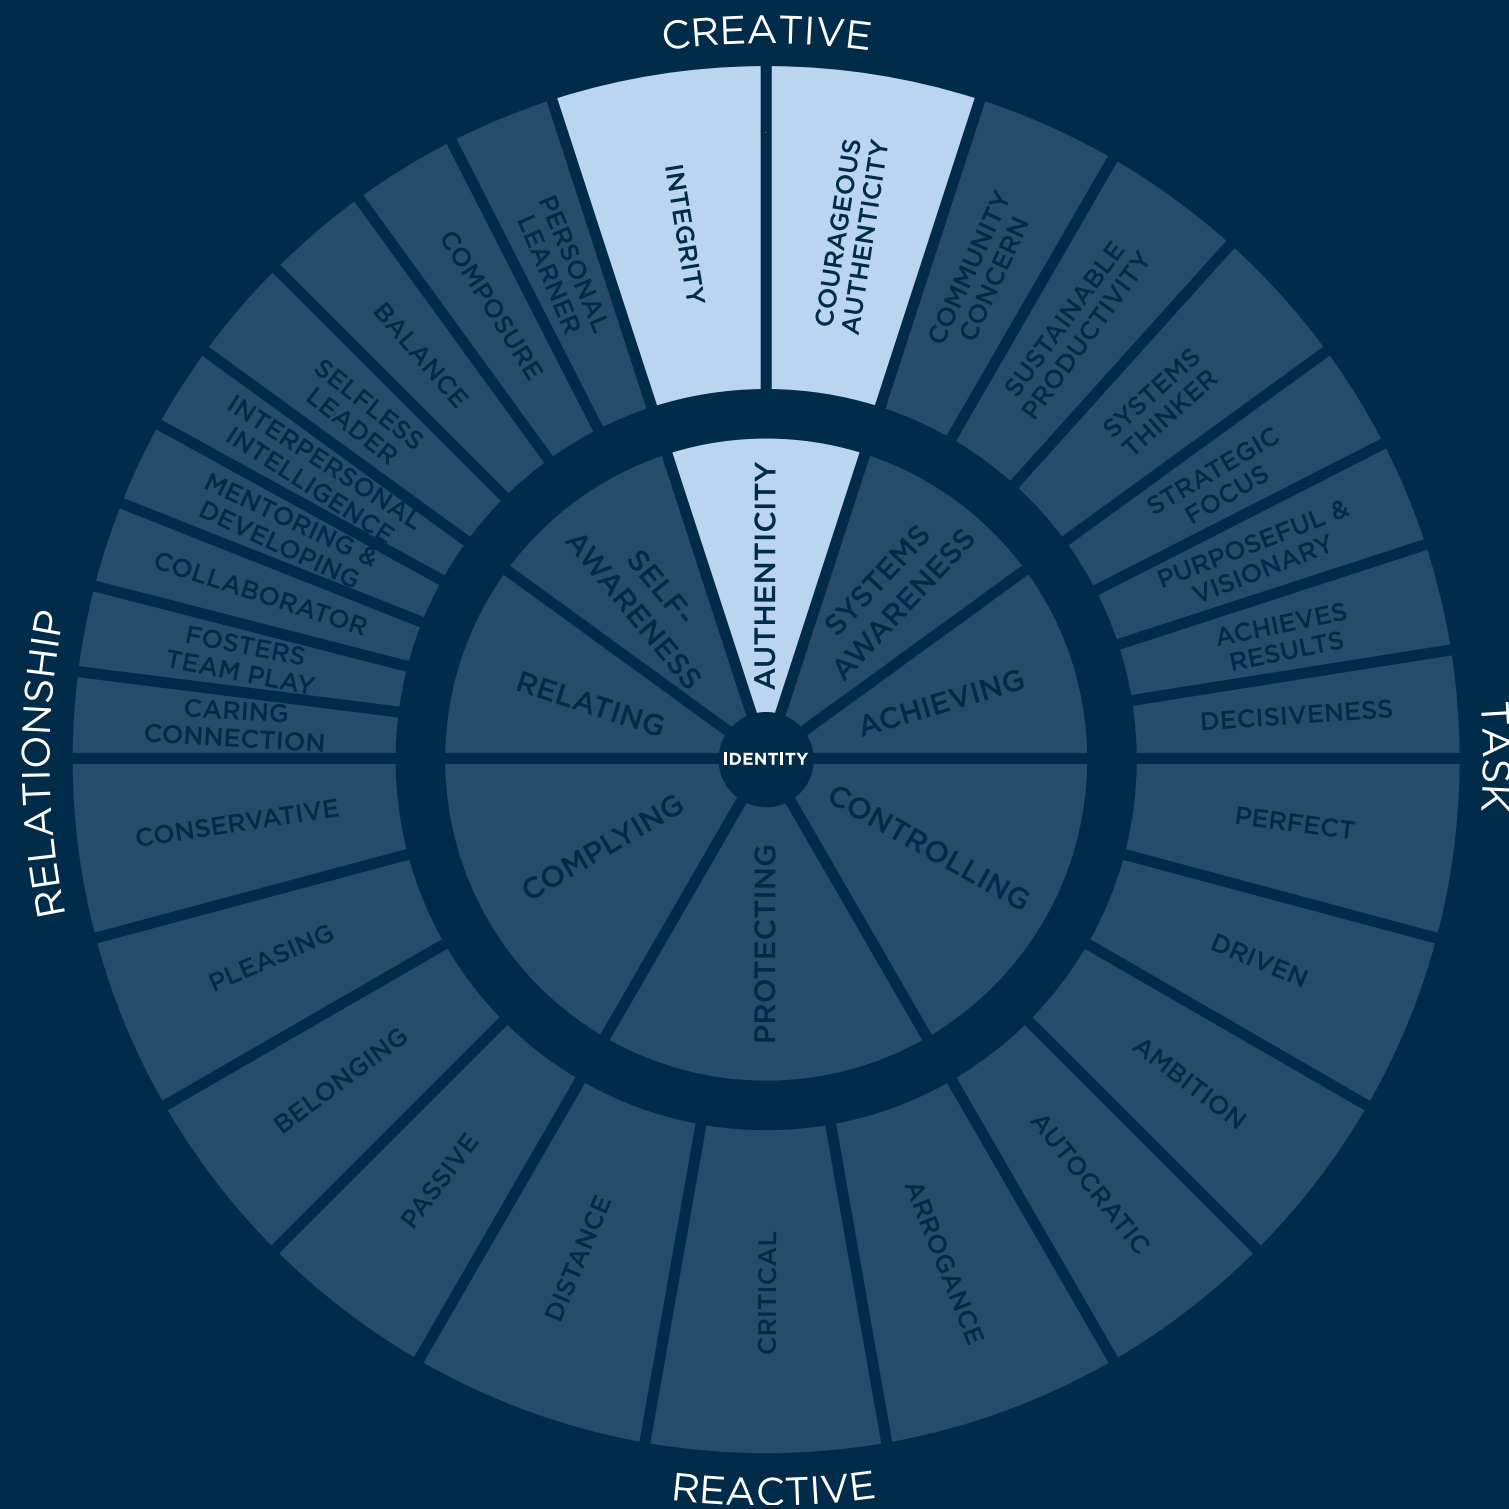

You are perceived as living the values and vision you articulate. This enables you to effectively communicate core values and be an effective model of the organization you are trying to build. You naturally engender trust and respect because you can put your high principles into practice.

Scoring high on Authenticity also suggests that you support the values for which the organization stands. Your gifts as a leader are at their best when your integrity is matched up with an organization you believe in. If this is the case you are in a powerful position to mobilize the aspirations of those who work with you toward a common purpose. Integrity is a necessary ingredient for great things to happen.

Because you are in integrity with yourself, scoring high on this dimension also means that you are able to express honestly what you feel. When others avoid bringing up important but difficult issues, you tend to step forward and speak. You are able to acknowledge your own contribution to a problem situation and admit when you’ve been wrong. You’re not afraid to provide direct feedback, and you don’t run away from conflict.

Very high scores on this dimension suggest an unusual ability and willingness to bring up issues in real-time (if so doing will help a relationship or team move forward). This means that you can disclose how you are feeling right now as a result of what is happening in the meeting. You can disclose how your behavior contributes to the current ineffectiveness of the group. It might mean putting into words what you and others are not saying (but will likely talk about in the hallway after the meeting adjourns).

You give authentic feedback and admit mistakes. You put yourself at risk for what you believe and value openness over popularity. Integrity and authenticity are what people trust the most. It is the source of your power.

Internal Assumptions

Internal Assumptions are the beliefs you use to organize your identity. They are the inner rules or beliefs that define how you see yourself and your relationship to the world. The Internal Assumptions often associated with the Authenticity dimension include:

- I am worthy whether people approve of me or not, whether I succeed or not
- Self worth, freedom, and security are in my own hands
- I maintain my self-esteem and security by being true to myself
- My greatest source of power is personal integrity
- It is more important to me to remain true to myself than to live up to others' expectations
- I am OK even if I make mistakes or hurt others' feelings
- I authentically admit my part in the problems we face
- The only way I lose face is by not being true to my vision and values
- Change starts with me; I must be the change I want to see in the world

Behaviors

Behaviors are the external expression of your Internal Assumptions. The general behaviors associated with the Authenticity dimension include:

- Being trusted by others
- Having high personal integrity
- Directly addressing issues that get in the way of team performance
- Speaking directly to the issues without smoothing them over
- Acting courageously in meetings
- Respecting another's opinion even if you disagree with it
- Staying open and honest about what you think and feel
- Managing conflict directly and authentically
- Surfacing issues others are reluctant to talk about
- Confronting peers and superiors when needed
- Being counted on to meet your commitments
- Exhibiting personal behavior consistent with your values
- Taking responsibility for your part of relationship and work related problems
- Speaking openly in the presence of "authorities"
- Living by an effective set of core values
- Holding to your values during good and bad times
- Living your vision in every encounter even when that requires risk

If you score medium

If your scores for the Authenticity dimension are in the medium range, then you will tend to express some of the behaviors and hold some of the internal assumptions described above. You may also be limited by some of the Reactive dimensions and thus show some of the tendencies described in the "If you score low" section below. You will need to read and reflect on the meaning of both high and low scores to find what aspects of each describe you.

If you score low

Scoring low on the Authenticity dimension can have serious implications for your leadership. The most successful leaders score high here. Please read about any high Reactive scores to explore how your internal assumptions may be blocking your Authenticity capacity.

Leadership research strongly suggests that a primary quality that people look to in their leaders is honesty, authenticity, or integrity. So, scoring low on Authenticity should get your attention. It suggests that your behavior may be interpreted as inconsistent, expedient or at the extreme, unprincipled. Lack of integrity erodes trust, stymies teamwork, and compromises your leadership.

Scoring low on this dimension suggests that you may be afraid of offending others, or you may be playing political games. Those who score low in courageous authenticity often remain silent about their beliefs in the face of opposition, real or imagined. They value equilibrium and keeping the peace over constructive conflict, and submit to authority even at the cost of group effectiveness or service.

You may have come from a background where standing up for your point of view was discouraged in the interests of group harmony. On the other hand, you may not have developed adequate interpersonal skills to confront and provide feedback without seeming rude or angry. Reflect on whether you:

- Articulate a mission that is not realistic
- Behave in ways that do not support your vision and values
- Are caught up in internal politics
- Are trying to please too many different constituencies
- Have violated confidences
- Have difficulty keeping commitments
- Avoid confronting issues
- Say what is politically correct
- Use language that masks reality (i.e., use positive sounding language to gloss over a difficult situation)
- Don't admit mistakes or the part you play in relationship problems
- Give feedback in a way that minimizes or smooths over your real concerns
- Say "Yes" when you want to say "No"
- Act cautiously around those with power
- Make agreements that you don't really support

Failing to confront problems allows them to fester, replacing conflict resolution with simmering resentment. A bias for taking the most popular path can lead to glossing over issues that may be critical for individual and organizational success. Skills in deciding when to confront, how to do so constructively, and how to negotiate under tough circumstances can be learned. Once mastered, they permit greater confidence in supporting open discussion without fear or guilt. Enhancing your Authenticity score contributes to trust and to a sense of integrity and completeness about your relationships with others.

Low scores can mean many things. It could have to do with a conflict between your value system and that of the organization. It could be the result of inner assumptions driving behavior that conflict with your values and vision. It could be that you are more focused on political maneuvering than on being true to yourself.

Honest reflection, including feedback from others, may assist in finding a steadier compass, reflected in an improved Authenticity score.

Related Scores

Low scores on this dimension can be related to low scores all across the Creative sphere. Low Authenticity scores undercut high achievement and stem from low self-awareness. Consequently, low scores on this dimension may well show up as low scores on any of the Creative Competencies. In addition, low scores on this scale are correlated with high scores in the Reactive sphere. High Reactive scores tend to block or limit your capacity for honest, authentic, and high integrity leadership. These limitations come from an internal insecurity such as not feeling worthy or loved, feeling rejected, not feeling needed, feeling alone and unprotected.

Integrity

Integrity measures how you adhere to a set of principles and can be trusted to “walk the talk.”

If you score high

Your inner and outer lives are congruent. Your behavior matches your values and others trust that you can be counted on to keep your word, meet your commitments, deal with them honestly and fairly, and remain true to your purpose.

Integrity is a quality most desire in their leader, so scoring high on integrity suggests that you are perceived as a leader, and that others will follow you or align with you because you practice what you preach. Your power in the organization is not primarily based on where you are in the hierarchy (position power), nor does being indirectly political attain it. Others give your power to you because you act with integrity.

You are perceived as living the values and vision you articulate. This enables you to effectively communicate core values and be an effective model of the organization you are trying to build. You naturally engender trust and respect because you can put your high principles into practice.

Scoring high on Integrity also suggests that you support the values for which the organization stands. Your gifts as a leader are at their best when your integrity is matched up with an organization you believe in. If this is the case, you are in a powerful position to mobilize the aspirations of those who work with you toward a common purpose. Integrity is a necessary ingredient for great things to happen.

You may employ many of the following orientations and practices that support your integrity. You:

- Live by an effective set of core values
- Hold to your values during good and bad times
- Are trustworthy
- Keep confidences
- Walk your talk; that is, your personal behavior is consistent with your values
- Admit when you are wrong
- Can be counted on to meet your commitments
- Are a good role model for the vision you espouse

If you score low

Leadership research strongly suggests that the primary quality that people look to in their leaders is integrity. So, scoring low on Integrity should get your attention. It suggests that your behavior may be interpreted as inconsistent, expedient or at the extreme, unprincipled. Lack of integrity erodes trust, stymies teamwork, and compromises your leadership.

Low scores can mean many things. It could have to do with a conflict between your value system and that of the organization. It could be the result of inner assumptions driving behavior that conflict with your values and vision (see the Reactive dimensions). It could be that you are more focused on political maneuvering than on being true to yourself. Honest exploration of the following questions, including feedback from others, may assist in finding a steadier compass:

- Do you articulate a mission that is not realistic?
- Do you behave in ways (that you may be blind to) that do not support your vision and values?
- Are you caught up in internal politics?
- Are you trying to please too many different constituencies?
- Do you espouse principles that the systems you work in do not permit you to practice?
- Have there been occasions when you’ve violated confidences?
- Do you have difficulty admitting errors?
- Do you keep your commitments?
- Do people know where you stand and what you stand for?

Courageous Authenticity

Courageous Authenticity measures your willingness, one-on-one and in groups, to take tough stands, bring up the “un-discussibles” (risky issues the group avoids discussing), openly deal with relationship problems, and share personal feelings/vulnerabilities about a situation. Courage in the workplace involves authentically and directly dealing with risky issues.

If you score high

Scoring high on Courageous Authenticity means that you have a high level of integrity in your communication. You are able to express honestly what you feel. You’re not afraid to provide direct feedback, and you don’t run away from conflict. When others avoid bringing up important but difficult issues, you step forward. At the same time, you are able to acknowledge your own part of a problem and admit when you’ve been wrong.

If you score very high on this dimension, it suggests an unusual ability and willingness to bring up issues in real-time if so doing will help a relationship or team move forward. This means that you may disclose how you are feeling right now as a result of what is happening in the meeting. It may mean also disclosing how you are contributing to the current ineffectiveness of the group. It might mean putting into words what you and others are not saying. These kinds of actions take courage and you do them in service of helping the meeting progress.

To support your personal authority, you have had to develop high level interpersonal skills in giving authentic feedback and admitting mistakes. You put yourself at risk for what you believe and value openness over popularity. Your authenticity depends upon your ongoing practice of some of the behaviors listed below. You:

- Are open about what you think and feel
- Surface the issues others are reluctant to talk about
- Speak directly to the issues without smoothing over them
- Are courageous in meetings
- Manage conflict authentically
- Provide complete and direct feedback to others
- Deal quickly, directly, and honestly with people problems
- Confront peers and superiors when needed
- Work out tough agreements
- Do not let problems fester
- Are willing to advocate an unpopular decision
- Are willing to admit mistakes
- Take responsibility for your part of relationship problems
- Speak directly even on controversial issues

If you score low

You may be afraid of offending others, or you may be playing political games. Those who score low in Courageous Authenticity often remain silent about their beliefs in the face of opposition, real or imagined. They value equilibrium and keeping the peace over constructive conflict, and submit to authority even at the cost of group effectiveness or service.

You may have come from a background where standing up for your point of view was discouraged in the interests of group harmony. On the other hand, you may not have developed adequate interpersonal skills to confront and provide feedback without seeming rude or angry.

Failing to confront problems allows them to fester, replacing conflict resolution with simmering resentment. A bias for taking the most popular path can lead to glossing over issues that may be critical for individual and organizational success. Skills in deciding when to confront, how to do so constructively, and how to negotiate under tough circumstances can be learned. Once mastered, they permit greater confidence in supporting open discussion without fear or guilt.

“Awareness is the gateway to consciousness.”

~Cindy Adams

The Systems Awareness Dimension

The Systems Awareness dimension measures the degree to which your awareness is focused on whole system improvement and on community welfare (the symbiotic relationship between the long-term welfare of the community and the interests of the organization).

If you score high

Scoring high on Systems Awareness suggests that you lead with the big picture in view. You do not jump to fix symptoms. You look for root cause. You know that the causes of current problems are to be found in the design of the current system out of which you operate. You know that breakthrough solutions cannot be found within the current paradigm; they require moving to new paradigms of thought and new principles of system design. You are an architect of systems that naturally manifest the results you envision. This larger perspective allows you to find leverage points—making change (perhaps seemingly small at the time) at the right place in the system that results in significant improvements in organizational performance.

As your score here reaches very high levels, your perspective becomes communal or global. You see the delicate relationship between the organization’s long-term well being and the good of the larger community. You care more and more about using the organization and your leadership as instruments for bettering the welfare of life globally. You see that what you do has far reaching implications. You search for solutions that are good for the organization and at the same time good for the environment and economic sustainability. In this way your leadership becomes a service to future generations.

Internal Assumptions

Internal Assumptions are the beliefs you use to organize your identity. They are the inner rules or beliefs that define how you see your self and your relationship to the world. The Internal Assumptions often associated with the Systems Awareness dimension include:

- I am an integral part of the whole
- My actions both reflect the larger culture and affect it
- Cause and effect are often far removed in both space and time
- Much of what runs the system is invisible and intangible
- Problems cannot be solved with the same thinking that created them
- Legacy is not about being remembered, but about contributing to the welfare of others
- I too am a complex system—a mix of strengths and weaknesses, light and dark; in this way, I reflect the world around me
- When I find unacceptable parts in others, it points to aspects of myself for which I have not been willing to be fully responsible

Behaviors

Behaviors are the external expression of your Internal Assumptions. The general behaviors associated with the Systems Awareness dimension include:

- Organizations and parts of the organization are redesigned on an ongoing basis
- Discussions explore the long-term impact of current decisions
- Planning includes the welfare of the larger system in which your system is embedded. This might range from departments that will be affected to the global impact of what you are doing.
- Customers and suppliers are included in your planning and strategy development
- Meetings regularly involve all the key stakeholders in a decision
- Environmental and community welfare is given high priority

If you score medium

If your scores for the Systems Awareness dimension are in the medium range, then you will tend to express some of the behaviors and hold some of the internal assumptions described above. You may also be limited by some of the Reactive dimensions and thus show some of the tendencies described in the “If you score low” section below. You will need to read and reflect on the meaning of both high and low scores to find what aspects of each describe you.

If you score low

Scoring low on Systems Awareness suggests that your leadership could benefit from developing more of a systems perspective. It suggests that you focus too narrowly and too short term. While this may be very necessary at times to ensure immediate survival and to solve a crisis, perhaps it has become too ingrained. You need to cultivate the ability to focus on more than one causal factor. You need to look for the causes of problems that rise out of the complex interrelationship between multiple variables.

Your leadership can be taken to the next level by stepping back from the urgency to fix the current crisis and asking questions like, “How is our thinking and structure currently organized to produce this crisis? How can we redesign the system to solve multiple problems, that is, redesign the system so that the problem no longer exists? Are we, through the way we think and the paradigm out of which we function, the cause of our own problem?”

Systems Awareness always includes being aware of how your organization fits within a larger web of relationships that makes up the economic, political, and natural environment. It includes the long-term cause and effect relationship that examines the impact of current decisions on future results. Scoring low here suggests that your focus is too narrow. It may only take into account the optimal functioning of your department or division and not the optimal fit between your function and the overall functioning of the organization. It may focus only on the short-term welfare of the organization and not take into account a broader network of relationships that extend beyond the bounds of the organization. You need to look at how all these interrelationships can be enhanced to create win-win solutions—a win for your organization and for the larger system of which your organization is but a part. Ultimately, great leadership thinks globally, not only in terms of global competitive strategy, but also of global welfare.

Scoring low may not be an immediate cause for alarm, unless you are so crisis focused that long term strategy and system design are compromising results. System/community perspective takes time and practice to develop. It leads to far greater leadership power and influence. Scoring low simply suggests you have a learning curve ahead if you are to take your leadership to the next level.

Related Scores

Low scores on Systems Awareness can be related to low scores in the Achieving dimension. Lacking a system perspective can have negative consequences for organizational achievement. In addition, low scores on this scale are correlated with high scores in the Reactive sphere. High Reactive scores tend to result in quick fix, reactive, problem solving. This can result in crisis management as you chase down the latest symptom, but fail to address the systemic cause of the problem.

You can also gain more insight into the specific behaviors associated with your System Awareness score by reading about the sub-scales that make up this dimension.

Community Concern

Community Concern measures the service orientation from which you lead. It measures the extent to which you link your legacy to service of community and global welfare.

If you score high

Scoring high on Community Concern suggests that your leadership is committed to making a positive contribution to the larger society. Your focus could be on the impact your organization can make on the local communities in which you are located. It could be on a single issue about which you care deeply or as broad as national or planetary welfare. You lead from the perspective that the organization has a responsibility to serve and preserve the larger web of relationships from which the organization takes life.

The most positively influential leaders of all times had this perspective. Research suggests that this expanding awareness of the world in need, coupled with a conviction to serve represents a very high level of leadership development. Scoring high means you may think and act in some of the following ways. You:

- Stress the role of the organization as corporate citizen
- Form effective alliances with political and social organizations to address community needs
- Balance community welfare with short term profitability
- Work to improve environmental impact made by the organization
- See the organization as the servant of the whole/global community
- Care deeply about global/community issues

If you score low

Scoring low on Community Concern does not necessarily mean that you do not care about community welfare. Perhaps you are very busy launching family and career. Perhaps you are involved in the community outside of work, but your role at work does not lend itself to making an impact on larger concerns. Perhaps you work for an organization that pays lip service to its responsibility to serve and preserve its larger environment. And perhaps this low score provides an opportunity for you to look at the meaning and impact of your work.

Reflect on whether you:

- Fail to articulate or to act on issues you care about
- Have not yet considered the legacy of your leadership
- Are primarily self-centered
- Feel insulated from the pressing issues of our times

An improvement in the Community Concern score reflects a shift toward a more comprehensive view of the role of an organization in society, including an increasing awareness of leadership providing a legacy beyond the tenure and the lifetime of the leader.

Sustainable Productivity

Sustainable Productivity measures the ability to achieve results in a way that maintains or enhances the overall long-term effectiveness of the organization. It measures how well you balance human and technical resources so that long term high performance is sustainable.

If you score high

You are able to produce results consistently over time. You have a long-range view that permits you to build upon achievements rather than to maximize temporary gains. While you set high standards, you provide support in meeting them and celebrate reaching milestones in the longer journey. Maintaining this balance suggests you have highly developed skills in managing long-term projects by providing necessary resources and setting targets that challenge rather than deplete team members.

You develop and support an organization that is able to perform at a high level and to sustain performance in a way that renews people rather than using them up. You:

- Use management practices that support long-term high performance
- Lead in a way that enhances capability and does not result in “burn-out”
- Achieve high performance that does not come at the expense of people
- Balance short-term results with long-term organizational health
- Allocate resources appropriately so as not to use people up
- Maintain high levels of morale over the long haul
- Balance short-term profitability with sustainable long-term

If you score low

Scoring low in Sustainable Productivity suggests that you may be measuring success too narrowly. Focusing on short-term results can distort performance goals and diminish your ability to lead, to communicate the “why” behind activities. It means requiring others to work day to day with high demands, limited vision, inadequate resources, and low morale.

You may take pride in your productivity, in doing more with less. In a highly competitive environment, this is often rewarded as a virtue. However, today’s success may undermine long-term health. Crisis management can become a way of life that reduces morale and drives away or diminishes the effectiveness of dedicated people.

You may have come to see high performance as survival, with need to drive others to produce at all costs. With this outlook, results come at the expense of those doing the work. Empowerment and learning are sacrificed for temporary productivity. Pursued over time, such an approach seriously undermines visioning and encourages cynicism.

Weakness on this dimension may indicate that you are handling stress poorly, retreating to a task orientation, and imperiling the long-term health of your organization. Reflect on whether you:

- Focus on short-term gains
- Spend most of your time in crises, “fighting fires”
- Allocate resources ineffectively
- Trend performance data over only short time frames
- Have difficulty relating to the human needs of direct reports
- Resent the discipline of project management
- Fail to accurately assess people’s capability
- Seldom establish objectives in long-term strategic contexts

Sustainable Productivity is an indicator of your commitment to the long-term objectives of the organization. Improving scores here affects your long-term sense of accomplishment and success as a leader, as well.

Systems Thinker

Systems Thinker measures the degree to which you think and act from a whole system perspective as well as the extent to which you make decisions in light of the long-term health of the whole system.

If you score high

Systems thinking is a way of paying attention to the complex interaction of many variables that are involved in creating current problems. Scoring high, you excel at root cause analysis. You have learned how to think about the long-term cause and effect relationship between the organization and the environment and how the components of the organization (resource acquisition, technology, structure, culture, etc.) interact (with each other and with the environment) to produce outcomes. The impact of current actions on future marketplace results informs your strategic thinking. You offer a macro view of the organization by looking at how processes interact with one another. You open an organization to questioning whether steps in a process add value and permits measurements so improvements can be tracked across departmental and functional lines.

Scoring high in Systems Thinker is an indication that you handle complexity by seeing patterns in otherwise fragmented or bureaucratized activities. As a leader, you maintain the big picture and work at a systems level to make improvements. In order to be successful over the long term, you know it is important that vision is linked to strategy and that strategy translates into system design. You work to assist others to see these connections. You may:

- Hold the big picture
- Redesign the system to solve multiple problems simultaneously
- Evolve organizational systems so that they produce envisioned results
- See the integration between all parts of the system
- Simplify overly complex processes
- Anticipate future consequences to current action
- Find breakthrough strategies and solutions
- Take the broadest possible view on a difficult situation

If you score low

You may be focusing too narrowly, putting out fires, acting defensively, and looking for a quick fix to problems. A systems perspective can be obscured by organizational structures that encourage divisions, departments, and functions to protect their turf. In your urgency to solve problems, you may overlook how the problem results from the very way the organization is designed. You also may not take a wide/long enough perspective to see how current problems result from the way the organization is relating to the environment. In addition, as you seek to meet multiple “political” demands, working on the deep structural causes of problems may be getting lost. As a result, many of the above problems recur, processes break down, and optimal results are compromised.

In order to attain better long-term performance, solve problems, and improve processes, you need a broader and longer view. You can’t get this alone. It requires that you get information from the organization as a whole to look at results, understanding that outcomes must be related to processes that can be measured. Without a process orientation, few meaningful measures of improvement will be available to you, and how processes interact will remain a mystery.

Without a system perspective at all levels, an organization will experience poor “fits” (alignments) between or among systems. Effort will be wasted and results “sub-optimized.” Reflect on whether you:

- Believe in magical, one shot solutions (fads)
- Prefer the belief that you are in control to examining systems
- Seldom explore implications and results of your actions
- Make decisions based on blame
- Spend little time analyzing how various parts of the system interact to manifest current results

Seeing the big picture liberates leaders from defensive micro managing and puts organizations on the path to improvement. Strengthening the Systems Thinker competency contributes to a new view of effectiveness and results in rapid and measurable gains for the organization.

“There are three essentials to leadership: humility, clarity, and courage.”

~Fuchan Yuan

The Achieving Dimension

The Achieving dimension measures the extent to which you offer visionary, authentic, and high achievement leadership. Below is a brief summary of what your Achieving results indicate.

If you score high

Scoring high on the Achieving dimension suggests that you maintain a high standard of excellence in your work and activities. You tend to be recognized as a leader in your chosen field of endeavor. Your own values, beliefs, vision, and intuitions motivate you from within. You take responsibility for your own actions and circumstances.

Risk taking is easier because you have a high sense of self-worth. Your inner self-confidence is clearly projected to the outside world.

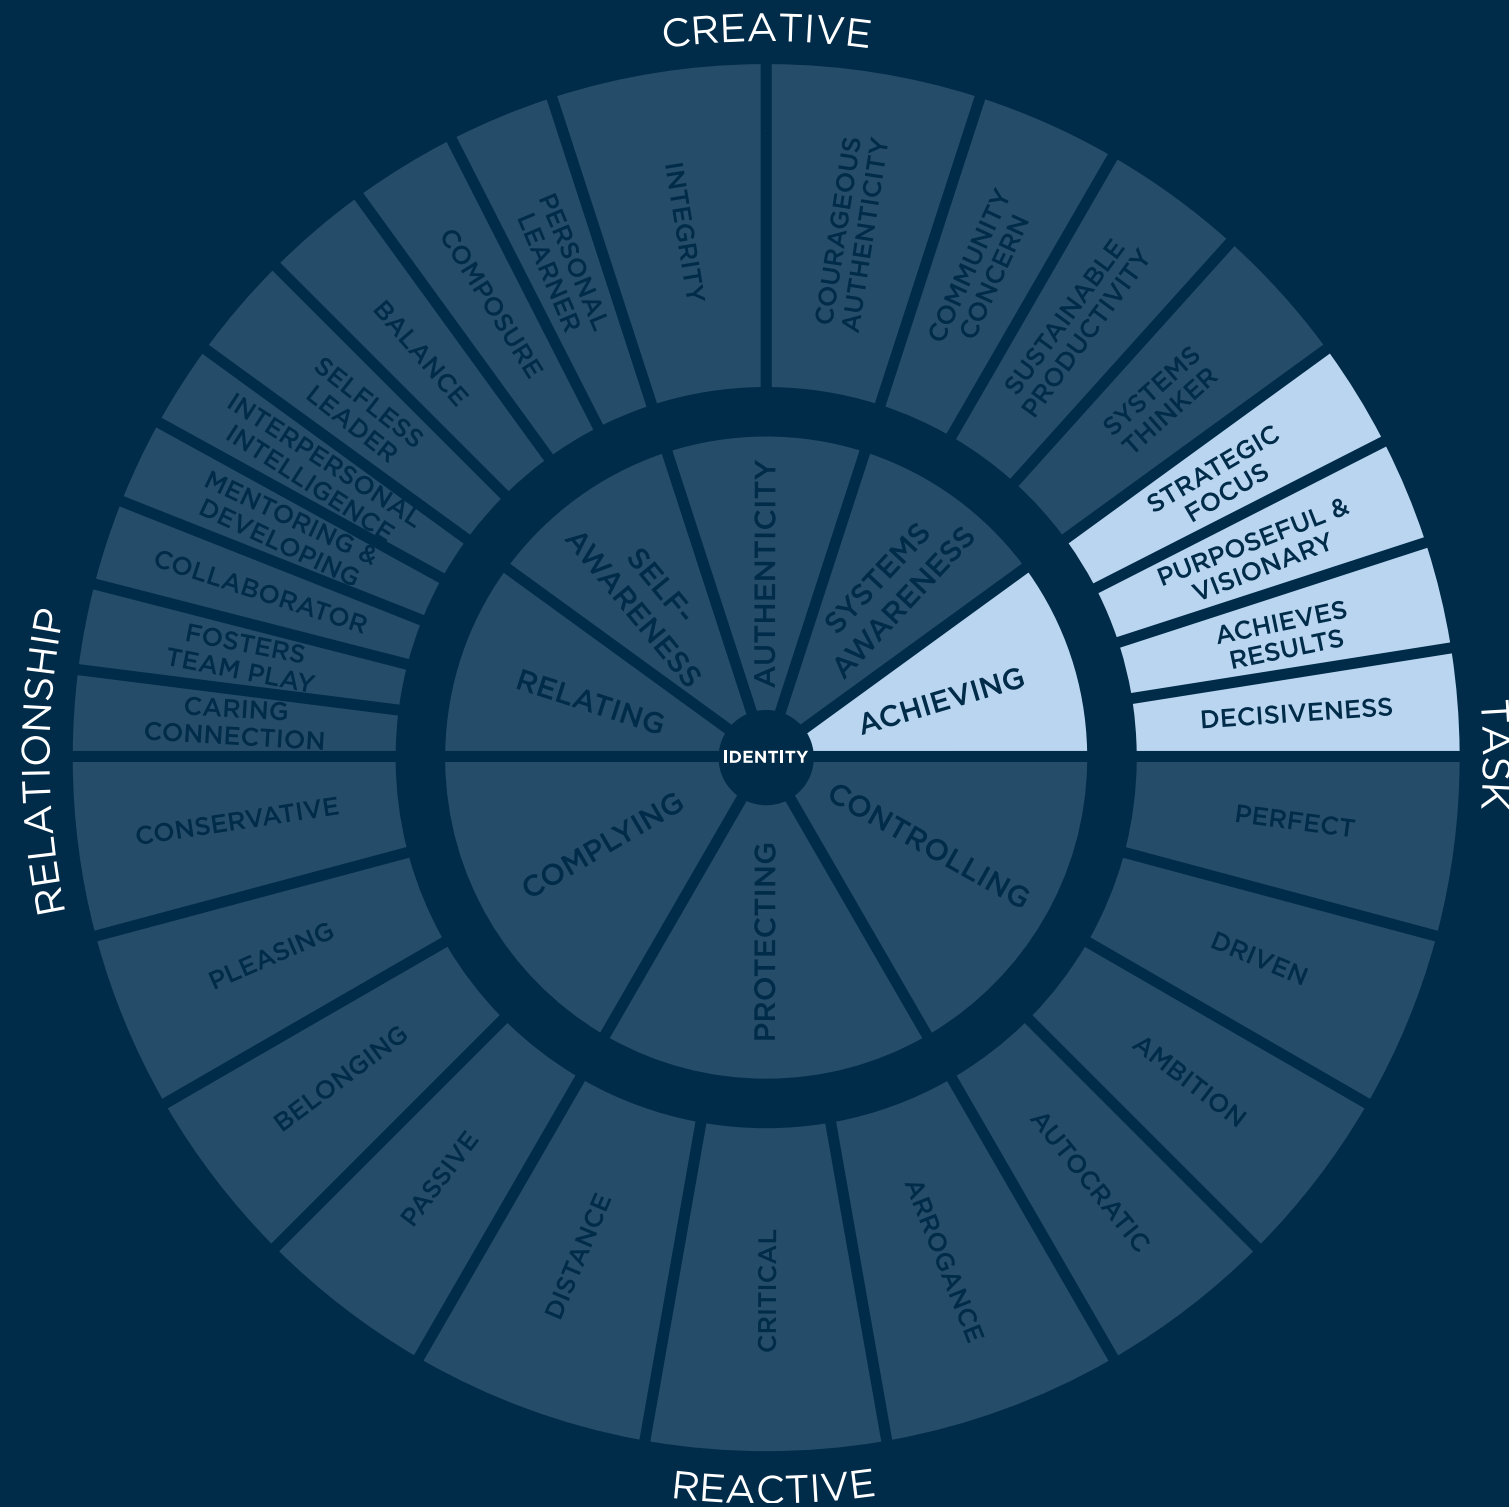

You tend to empower others by modeling and teaching your creative process. You know how to create vision and translate vision into strategies, strategies into goals, and goals into actions that achieve results. Your optimism, creativity, and natural curiosity are contagious. Others learn this just by being around you.

You have a deep sense of purpose, and create out of love for the result or the process of creating. You do what you do, not as a means to prove your worth or assure security, but because you want to be creative, learn and grow.

Internal Assumptions

Internal Assumptions are the beliefs you use to organize your identity. They are the inner rules or beliefs that define how you see your self and your relationship to the world. The Internal Assumptions often associated with the Achieving dimension include:

- I have a purpose and mission in life
- People want to fulfill their purpose and mission in life
- I am responsible for the results in my life
- I am interdependent with all of life
- It is safe to tell the truth without adding emotional judgements and blame
- I can choose my attitude towards events
- Personal worth is inherent and independent of circumstances

Behaviors

Behaviors are the external expression of your Internal Assumptions. The general behaviors associated with the Achieving dimension include:

- Taking initiative
- Setting high standards for achievement
- Learning from experience
- Viewing situations through a positive/optimistic filter
- Focusing persistently on creating what matters most
- Acting as a role model
- Striking a balance between being active and being receptive
- Offering your original perspectives
- Initiating projects
- Reaching for high goals
- Speaking openly in the presence of “authorities”
- Listening and learning from subordinates

If you score medium

If your scores for the Achieving dimension are in the medium range, then you will tend to express some of the behaviors and hold some of the internal assumptions described above. You may also be limited by some of the Reactive dimensions and thus show some of the tendencies described in the “If you score low” section below. You will need to read and reflect on the meaning of both high and low scores to find what aspects of each best describe you.

If you score low

Scoring low on Achieving can be a big problem. This dimension contains many of the leadership competencies that are traditionally thought of as leadership. These are the competencies that make things happen. Also, look at the Reactive dimensions for internal assumptions that may be blocking your full creative capability.

Scoring low suggests that you are under performing. The behaviors associated with low scores in the Achieving dimension include:

- Making excuses for not meeting goals or commitments
- Waiting for others to set direction or make decisions before acting
- Doing what you know is easily accomplished
- Striving to prove yourself through achievements
- Avoiding the risk of big challenges
- Blaming others for your problems—expecting them to do most of the changing
- Defending yourself, being slow to admit mistakes, ignoring failures and shortcomings
- Playing out various roles in your life rather than acting from your authentic center

Related Scores

Low scores on Achieving can be related to low scores all across the Creative sphere. All of the competencies that comprise effective leadership spring from an internal source of self-knowledge. Consequently, low scores on this dimension may well show up as low scores on any of the Creative Competencies. In addition, low scores on this scale are correlated with high scores in the Reactive sphere. High Reactive scores tend to block or limit your capability to discover and lead from your own inner vitality, integrity, and vision. These behaviors come from an internal insecurity such as not feeling worthy or loved, feeling rejected, not feeling needed, feeling alone and unprotected.

Strategic Focus

Strategic Focus measures the extent to which you think strategically. It measures how well you translate strategic thinking into rigorous and thoroughly developed business strategies to ensure that the organization will thrive in the near and long-term.

If you score high

Scoring high on Strategic Focus means that strategic ability is a well-developed competency. You are aware of current trends in the environment and are adept at developing strategies that ensure organizational success. You develop innovative responses to market trends. You think both short and long-term. You do not optimize the short term at the expense of the long-term. You know your organization’s strengths, weaknesses, and unique competitive advantages; and, you make strategic decisions that have your organization optimally deployed in the marketplace.

Scoring high on Strategic Focus may mean that you:

- Think strategically
- Do not get overly caught-up in short-term firefighting and are able to devote adequate attention to strategic initiatives
- Have a good sense for what will work in the marketplace
- Are rigorous in your analysis of data used for planning
- Have a good process in place for maintaining an ongoing strategic perspective within the organization
- Know well your organization’s strengths and weaknesses
- Know how to play to your organization’s strengths
- Set a course that ensures the organization’s ability to thrive
- Have a good sense of timing for market place initiatives
- Ask questions about the strategic implications of day-to-day decisions being made
- Understand the big picture of how your organization’s mission fits in the marketplace

If you score low

Scoring low on Strategic Focus may or may not be a problem. You may have a role that is not involved in strategic planning. Consequently, your low scores here may simply be a function of your role or job responsibilities. However, the larger your leadership responsibilities, the more important strategic focus becomes. If you lack strategic focus, you run the risk of missing out on significant market opportunities. You are also likely to make decisions in the short run that set the organization on a course for reduced performance and even failure in the long run.

With inadequate strategic focus, it is likely that others are frustrated with your lack of direction. When organizations lack strategic focus they are often managed by the crisis of the moment. Firefighting in response to the latest emergent issue is how the organization spends its intellectual capital. People become so caught-up in responding and reacting to events, that they do not take the time to carefully envision and plan for the future. This ensures that the organization will stay caught in firefighting. Scoring low on this dimension suggests that your leadership lacks sufficient strategic focus. You may be inadvertently setting the organization up for reduced performance.

Scoring low on Strategic Focus may suggest you:

- Are overly focused on day-to-day operational issues leaving inadequate attention for longer-term strategic thinking and planning.
- Make decisions in the short-term that undermine long-term strategies
- Scatter your attention in too many places
- Take risks
- Have too much ego involvement with success causing the organization to over-reach strategically or to pursue directions that are more about your legacy than what is in the best long-term interest of the organization
- Think that you are the only one with a well-developed strategic capability and thus you do not adequately involve others in the planning process
- Lack rigorous analysis, relying too much on hunch and “gut feel”
- Suffer from analysis paralysis
- Have an inadequate process for engaging the organization in strategic planning

Purposeful & Visionary

Purposeful & Visionary measures the extent to which you clearly communicate and model commitment to personal purpose and vision.

If you score high

You have a deep sense of purpose that comes through in your optimism, enthusiasm, and passion. You also clearly communicate a compelling vision of the future, and encourage others to have their own vision. You foster alignment by creating group vision. You do this through dialogue with group members, which yields high levels of commitment and alignment.

The primary contribution of leaders is to cultivate vision and purpose. This is done both by what you communicate (verbally or in writing) and by being a model of the purpose and vision you hold. When people meet with you they get your vision. In short, you are a person of high purpose and far reaching vision. All the research on leadership suggests that this is essential for you and your organization to be successful.

You can provide vision in one of two ways—by being the primary visionary or by facilitating the vision. Being the primary visionary usually means you create the vision and enroll others in it. Being a facilitator of the vision means that you know the group must be passionately committed to their own vision. And so, you facilitate the group in the ongoing process of getting clear on the vision for the organization. Your vision and that of others, is informed and enhanced in dialogue. The net result is that the entire group has authored the vision and therefore owns it.

Scoring high on Purposeful & Visionary suggests that you:

- Communicate a compelling vision
- Invite others to take part in the developing vision, thus, establishing shared vision
- Live and work with a deep sense of purpose
- Live/lead from deeply held core values
- Are optimistic and inspire others
- Are both highly motivated and motivating to be around
- Think outside the box, see possibilities and pursue them
- Come up with many unique and creative ideas
- Are constantly creating improvements in performance
- Maintain a future results oriented focus
- Stay focused on envisioned results even in the face of obstacles
- Are not limited by doubts about what is possible
- Believe that you can make a positive difference

If you score low

Scoring low on Purposeful & Visionary means that you are not offering leadership. You may be managing effectively, but clear vision and deep purpose is the essence of leadership. Leadership and vision are nearly synonymous.

There is any number of possibilities for why you would score low here:

- Do you work in an organization that thwarts your vision through high control management style or other practices that have eroded your motivation?
- Do you know what you stand for?
- Do you not take the time to reflect or engage in conversations that result in clarity of vision and purpose?
- Are you burned out or have you lost the fire that once was there?
- Are you in the midst of, or recovering from a crisis that leaves you momentarily without vision or a sense of purpose?

- Are you are in the midst of a significant adult transition where old visions and purposes are disintegrating and new vision has not yet emerged?
- Does your vision require courage to pursue? Does it remain buried under fear?
- Do you hold an inner assumption (see the Reactive dimensions for Inner Assumptions) that blocks your visionary leadership potential?

These are all possibilities and each has different ramifications. Only you can sort out what is going on. It is imperative that you do, if it is your role and desire to lead.

Achieves Results

Achieves Results measures the degree to which you are goal directed and have a track record of goal achievement and high performance.

If you score high

You consistently achieve at a high level. You are goal directed, take well-calculated risks and have a track record of high performance. You have developed a real proficiency for achieving high quality results on key initiatives. You know how to create vision and translate vision into strategies, strategies into goals, and goals into actions that achieve results. This bodes well for you.

If your Relating scores are high, it suggests that you get high performance through developing high performance in others. This is ideal. It suggests that not only can you perform at a high level, but that you raise the level of play of those with whom you work.

You achieve at high levels because you:

- Are action oriented and results focused
- Maintain a high level of energy for challenging results
- Take calculated risks—risks with a reasonably good chance of success
- Notice and seize opportunity
- Strive for continuous improvement
- Persevere in the face of setbacks and resistance
- Seldom give up and do so only when it is appropriate
- Love what you do
- Are well qualified for the technical aspects of the job
- Have a strong track record of goal attainment
- Get the job done

If you score low

Scoring low on Achieves Results needs to get your full attention. It suggests that you are not getting the job done. It means you are falling short of expectations. The question is whose expectations are you not meeting—your own internal standards or the organizations targets. If it is the latter, and you don't correct it, you may not be in your current position very long.

If you are meeting and/or exceeding organizational requirements, but not your own it is a different story. If this is the case, take a look at the Reactive dimensions for why this might be. Especially look at the Driven dimension. It may well be that your own internal standards are set so high that even you cannot reach them.

Either way, a low score here is a flag for impending crisis. It is important that you truthfully answer the following types of questions:

- Am I getting the job done?
- Do I hold back out of fear, caution, or apathy?
- Does this score reflect that I have not developed the ability to achieve at a high level?
- Am I in a new job and feeling the struggle of a steep learning curve?
- Have I lost my inner sense of commitment, passion, or excitement for my work?
- Is the organization stifling my ability to achieve? If yes, how am I letting the organization limit me?
- Is there some other competency that I need to develop that is limiting my ability to achieve?
- Am I in the midst of a significant adult transition where it is natural for achievement to drop off?
- Am I feeling over my head?
- Do I manage from crisis to crisis?
- Do I spend enough time on long-term vision and strategy?

Decisiveness

Decisiveness measures your ability to make decisions on time, and the extent to which you are comfortable moving forward in uncertainty.

If you score high

You are confident in making difficult decisions, balancing data and intuition in uncertain conditions. You take your responsibilities as a decision-maker seriously, focus on what's important, and prefer taking reasonable risks to inaction. You are not reckless, but take responsible action in the face of risk. A high score suggests that others can count on you to face important issues and make balanced decisions under pressure.

Part of a leader's function is to decide. Others observe leaders' actions and often attribute delay to lack of competence or vacillation. You maintain confidence in your abilities and are disposed to action through the following practices. You:

- Make decisions in a timely manner
- Remain decisive under pressure
- Move forward even with incomplete information when appropriate
- Focus in quickly on the key issues
- Make efficient use of data to arrive at decisions
- Are willing to trust your gut
- Make the tough decisions when required

If you score low

You may be procrastinating, undermining others' confidence in you by avoiding decisions you see as having some risk. Delay may suggest to others that you are hiding, hoping that important matters will resolve themselves or others will assume responsibilities that are properly yours.

There are always reasons for delay. You may be overly dependent upon data, awaiting every shred of information before you can act. You may distrust intuition as a guide in ambiguous situations. You may not wish to violate norms of consensus and refuse to act until you have everyone's agreement. You may confront conflicts in priorities and values without decision criteria to choose among them. All are possible, but it is likely that consistent failure to put yourself "on the line" will contribute to drift in operations and erosion of strategic goals.

Low scores on Decisiveness are often associated with one or more high scores on the Complying/Protecting dimensions. This suggests that the indecisive behavior results from an internal assumption that links your personal sense of security and/or self-worth to being approved of by others and meeting their expectations.

By failing to act you leave consequences to chance and reduce trust in your ability to lead. It is important to identify key areas where action is required, to obtain the best information and advice possible and then to act.

ACHIEVING

“To do great things is difficult; but to command great things is more difficult.”

~Friedrich Nietzsche

LEADERSHIP
CIRCLE

The Controlling Dimension

The Controlling dimension measures the extent to which you establish a sense of personal security and worth through task accomplishment, personal achievement, power, and control. The Controlling dimension is comprised of four subscales: Perfect, Driven, Ambition, and Autocratic. Each of these is inversely correlated with most of the Creative dimensions. The location of each dimension in the circular graph indicates the strength of the correlation. The lower in the circle, the progressively larger the inverse correlations become. Below is a brief summary of what your Controlling results indicate.

If you score high

Scoring high on the Controlling scale suggests that you strive to take charge, be on top, and exert control over others in order to gain self-worth, personal safety, and identity. You see the world as made up of winners and losers, where powerful people stand the best chance. So, in order to survive, you must be one of them. You must excel heroically, be perfect, perform flawlessly, and/or dominate. Hence, you become one of the movers and shakers of the world.

Internal Assumptions

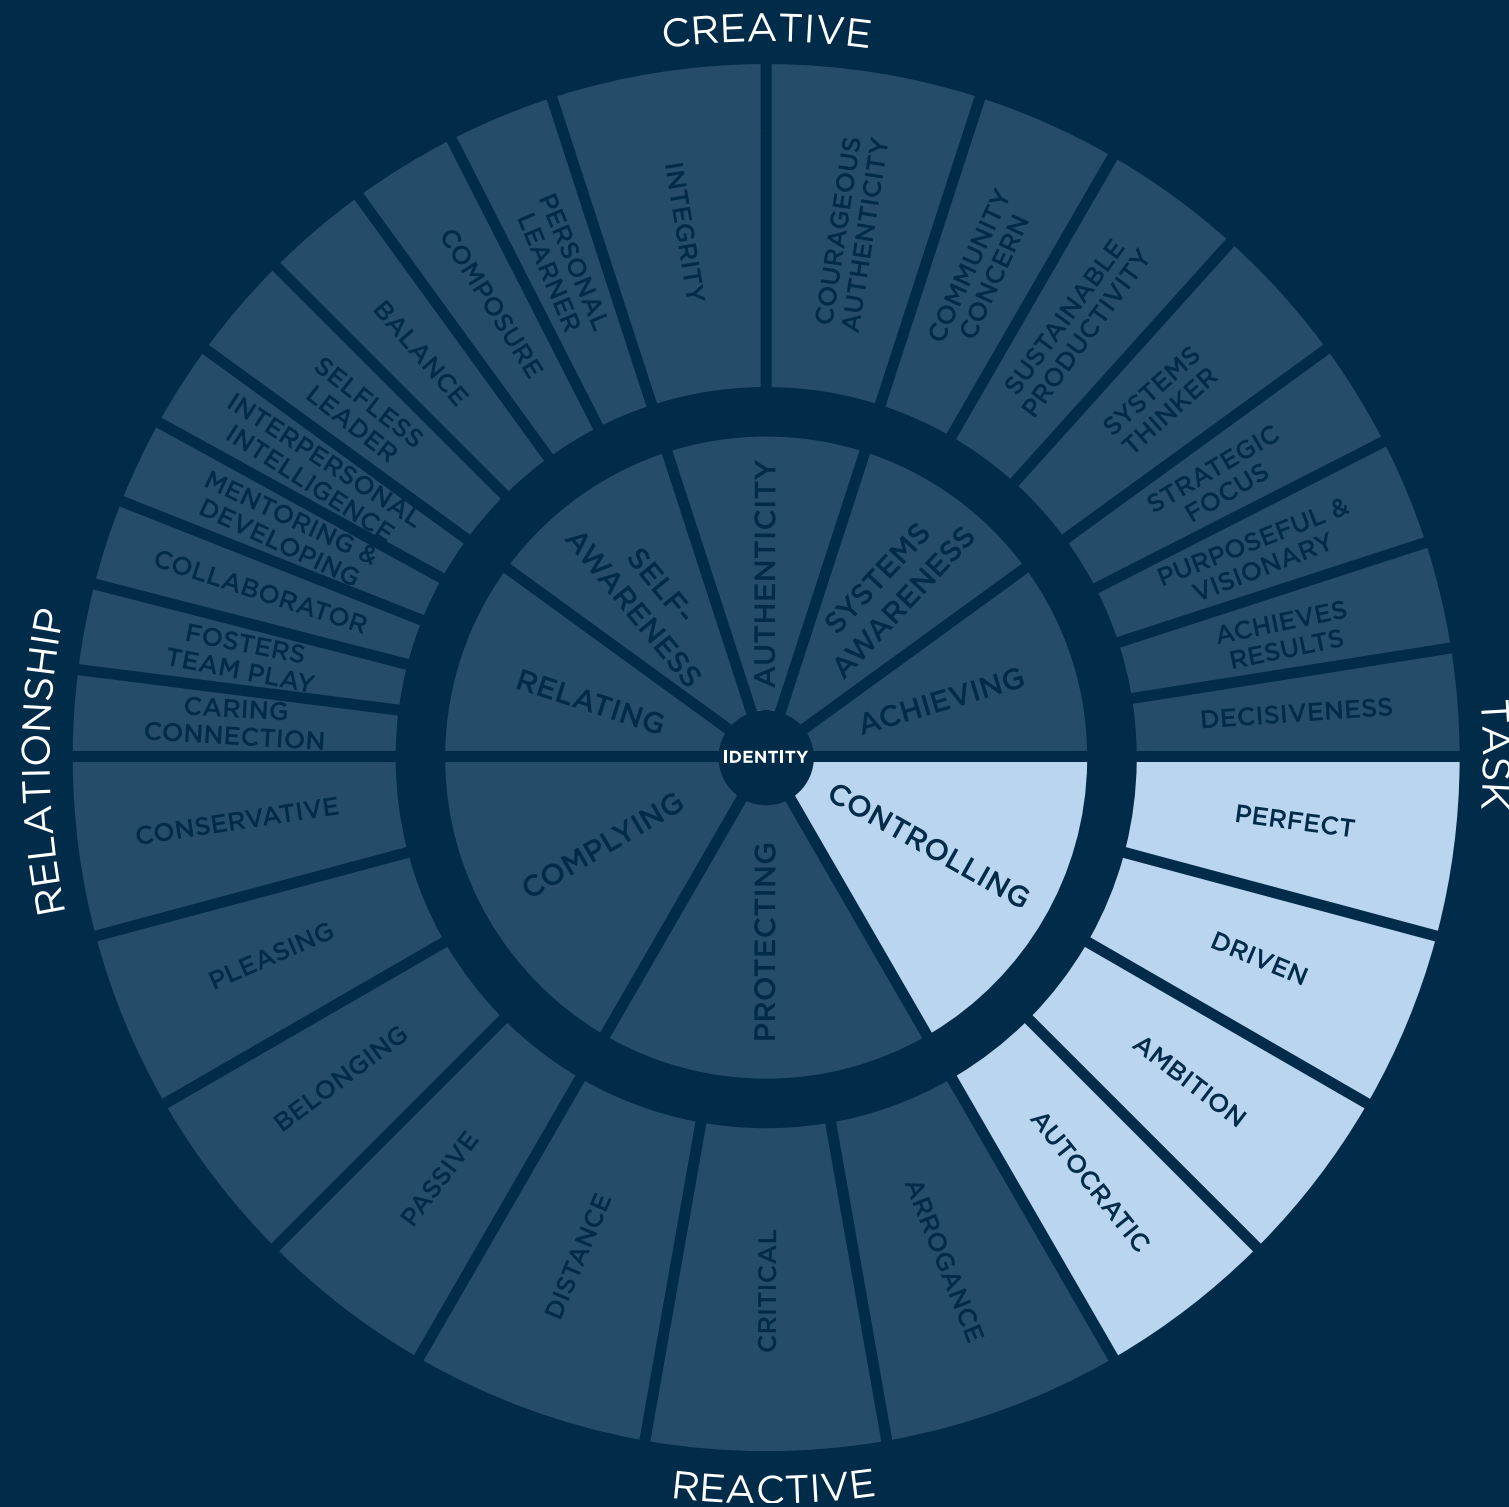

Internal Assumptions are the beliefs you use to organize your identity. They are the inner rules or beliefs that define how you see yourself and your relationship to the world. The Internal Assumptions often associated with the Controlling dimension include:

- I stay safe by taking charge
- Only the strong survive and I will be one of them
- I need to triumph over others to feel good about myself
- Anything less than perfect is not okay
- I am a valuable person when people look up to me with admiration
- The world is made up of winners and losers
- Being less than others is unacceptable and threatens my security
- Failure, of any proportion, could lead to my demise

Behaviors

Behaviors are the external expression of your internal assumptions. The general behaviors associated with the Controlling dimension include:

- Competing
- Setting exacting standards
- Striving for perfection
- Using authority to take charge, influence, and get your way
- Exerting tremendous effort and energy to achieve goals
- Speaking directly and bluntly
- Pushing yourself and others to win
- Taking charge in most situations

Gifts and Strengths

Every Reactive dimension is capable and gifted. When using the strengths of the Controlling dimension you will tend towards:

- Pursuing continuous improvement
- Excelling in many situations
- Setting high standards
- Creating results
- Influencing others
- Speaking your opinion even if it is controversial
- Taking charge and getting into action

Liabilities

Every Reactive dimension has liabilities and limitations. The down side of the Controlling dimension is the constant need (conscious or unconscious) to continuously excel, dominate, compete, win, and control.

These needs result in behaviors which tend toward:

- Being overly aggressive
- Discounting or ignoring negative feedback
- Believing your own “press”
- Demanding flawless performance of yourself and others
- Overlooking others’ aspirations and goals
- Having a strong need to compete causing you to see everything in terms of winning and losing
- Fearing and avoiding failure
- Becoming so preoccupied with winning that you lose focus on the pursuit of excellence and achievement and, as a result, do not perform up to your real potential
- Putting results ahead of the work group’s feelings
- Setting unrealistic standards of performance for others
- Managing in high-control ways that are costly to the organization

Scoring high suggests that you have a need to be seen as aggressive, strong, invulnerable, right, on top, better/more than others, perfect, flawless, and/or heroic. You tend to struggle with relationships, team development, and collaboration skills (see Relating).

Related Scores

High scores on this scale are also correlated with reduced scores in the Creative sphere. Relating and Self-Awareness scores are often reduced if Controlling scores are high. This is because high control comes from a bias for establishing self-worth and security on task performance, status, and achievement. In this equation people are undervalued. The people skills represented by Relating are considered soft and thus, a threat to the need to be strong and in control. The time and energy it takes to grow in self-awareness is not valued because it does not lead to immediate bottom-line results. Taking time to reflect and learn about the inner world of the Self is not seen as practical or “real world.”

Scoring high here can also result in lower Authenticity scores because you may be so focused on moving up and succeeding that you become “political.” That is, you do or say whatever needs to be done/said to advance your career.

Finally, scoring high here can result in low Achieving scores. This may seem like a surprise and it does not mean that you do not get results. It may, however, mean that you get those results at the expense of building a sustainable high performance, high-fulfillment culture. It can also mean that you go about the task of achieving as a way of trying to prove yourself rather than from the internal motivational system that operates in Achieving—creating for its own sake, creating because you love doing it, creating because it is aligned with your deeper purposes.

If you score low

If you scored low on Controlling it suggests that you have few of the characteristics described above. It further suggests (depending on your scores on other scales) that you may possess many of the strengths of this stance without the liabilities.

Perfect

Perfect is a measure of your need to attain flawless results and perform to extremely high standards in order to feel secure and worthwhile as a person. Worth and security is equated with being perfect, performing constantly at heroic levels, and succeeding beyond all expectations. The strong need for high quality is a strength of this style, provided that you can resist the urge to do everything yourself and can refrain from becoming upset (with yourself and others) by comparatively minor imperfections in work output.

If you score high

If you scored high on Perfect you may have some of the following tendencies. You may:

- Be direct, driven, and high focused on attaining results
- Be concerned with appearances, wanting to appear extremely competent and totally confident
- Be so focused on task accomplishment that you appear isolated and cold to others
- Be perfectionistic
- Set performance standards at unrealistically high levels, thereby causing task performance to be stressful
- Set very demanding performance standards
- Strive so hard for perfection that you become obsessed with improving and eliminating mistakes
- Lose sight of the realistic and practical compromises necessary for the task’s completion
- Be overly organized

- Be unable to delegate or delegate with excessive detail, communicating a lack of trust in the other's capability
- Set unrealistically high goals for others
- Be overly critical of others when they do not meet your expectations
- Become overwhelmed by the elaborate reporting and review system you have established

Perfectionism is an assumption that overextends strengths. The desire of success and perfection has driven great achievements and improvements. Here, however, they create a trap, leading ultimately to reduced performance. The drive for perfection needs to be brought into realistic balance and to ensure personal, team and system health.

Look to the other Reactive scores to see if Perfect is causing you a problem. Perfectionism can result in overdrive (Driven), over-control (Autocratic), Critical behavior, and in perceived Arrogance. Also, look at your Pleasing and Belonging scores. If these are high you may be trying to be perfectly acceptable/pleasing to others and/or using high performance as a strategy to win approval. If all these scores are below average and your Relating scores are strong, then your high score here simply means you have high standards—not excessively high.

If you score low

Scoring low on Perfect is generally considered positive. Your scoring low simply means that your full creative self-expression and leadership are probably not being limited by a high need to excel perfectly and beyond measure. It suggests that your sense of self worth does not come through perfect accomplishment. A low score does not mean that, in fact, you are leading and creating powerfully. It simply means that you have the absence of this block to empowered leadership. Your scores in the Creative half of the circle will let you know the extent to which your full leadership potential is being expressed.

Driven

Driven is a measure of the extent to which you are in overdrive. It is a measure of your belief that your worth and security is tied to accomplishing a great deal through hard work. It measures your need to perform at a very high level in order to feel worthwhile as a person. A good work ethic is a strength of this style, provided that you keep things in balance and are able to balance helping others achieve with your own achievement.

If you score high

If you scored high on Driven you may have some of the following tendencies. You may:

- Work very hard long hours
- Always be in push mode
- Find it hard to relax or take your foot off the accelerator
- Work so hard that you don't have time to develop others so as to build their capability and to offload (delegate) some of what you do

- Try to do too much and consequently, not focus on the most strategic ways you can add value
- Undervalue what others can do, thus, doing it yourself and not developing them
- Want to be accepted or pleasing to your boss and peers so that you take on too much and lack the ability to say no or to set realistic priorities and deadlines
- Be direct, driven, and high focused on attaining results
- Be concerned with appearances, wanting to appear extremely competent and totally confident
- Take on work loads that are unrealistically high, thereby causing task performance to be stressful
- Set very demanding performance standards for yourself and others
- Conveying, through your long hours, that others need to do the same
- Strive so hard to do it all that you lack focus
- Establishing the kind of climate that produces short term results, that are not sustainable over the long haul because people (yourself and/or others) burn out
- Lose sight of the realistic and practical compromises necessary for the task's completion
- Be overly organized

Driven is an assumption that overextends strengths. A good work ethic is one thing, but when your worth and security get connected to doing it all, work becomes compulsive and you lack the time to develop others and lose the focus required to prioritize strategically. It may be counterintuitive, but your excessive drive may be hurting overall performance. Overdrive can result from a high score at Perfect. Excessive drive may also be causing Autocratic and Critical behavior. Finally, look at your Belonging and Pleasing score. If these are high it is likely that, in an effort to be acceptable, you are taking on too much.

If you score low

Scoring low on Driven is positive. Since high scores on this scale are correlated with low scores all across the Creative half of the circle, your scoring low simply means that your full creative self-expression and leadership are probably not being limited by an excessive need to work hard to excel in order to feel okay. A low score does not mean that, in fact, you are leading and creating powerfully. It simply means that you have the absence of a block to empowered leadership. Your scores in the Creative half of the circle will let you know the extent to which your full leadership potential is being expressed.

Ambition

Ambition measures the extent to which you need to get ahead, move up in the organization, and be better than others. Ambition is a powerful motivator. This scale assesses if that motivation is positive—furthering progress—or negative—overly self-centered and competitive.

If you score high

If you scored high on Ambition you may have some of the following tendencies. You may:

- Strive hard to get ahead
- Push yourself to excel
- Work hard to be noticed as a high performer
- Seek credit rather than share credit
- Act in your own political self-interest at the expense of others interests or the interests of the organization
- Compare yourself with others as a measure of self-worth
- Compete with others in an effort to shine
- Believe that your self-esteem is related to your altitude in the corporate pyramid
- Turn conflict into win-lose contests rather than finding win-win solutions
- Manipulate others as a strategy to protect your advancement opportunities
- Drive yourself and others excessively hard to get results
- Talk too much at meetings as a way of attracting attention to yourself
- Lack focus on developing your people
- Struggle with developing teamwork and being a team member
- Push yourself and others too hard, compromising long-term sustainability of high performance

Ambition is generally considered positive. Certainly, to advance into higher positions and to take on the work-load that comes with these positions, ambition is necessary. When ambition becomes extreme it creates problems. Ambition becomes excessive when you connect your sense of personal worth with being better than others and/or moving higher in the organization. Look to other scores (for example, Relating scores, Autocratic, Driven and Critical scores) to determine if your high score here may be causing problems.

If you score low

Scoring low on Ambition is generally positive. Scoring too low may indicate lack of drive (see your Passive score). Since high scores on this scale are correlated with low scores all across the Creative half of the circle, your scoring low simply means that your full creative self-expression and leadership are probably not being limited by an excessive ambition. A low score does not mean that, in fact, you are leading and creating powerfully. It simply means that you have the absence of a block to empowered leadership. Your scores in the Creative half of the circle will let you know the extent to which your full leadership potential is being expressed.

Autocratic

Autocratic measures your tendency to be forceful, aggressive and controlling. It measures the extent to which you equate self-worth and security to being powerful, in control, strong, dominant, invulnerable, or on top. Worth is measured through comparison, that is having more income, achieving a higher position, being seen as a most/more valuable contributor, gaining credit, or being promoted.

If you score high

Scoring high on Autocratic suggests that you have some of the following tendencies. You may:

- Have a high need for power
- Be concerned with gaining prestige, authority, and influence over others; in fact, you may be so concerned with gaining this type of power that you pursue it in a forceful, almost relentless manner, rather than seeking to obtain others' respect in a quieter, more cooperative way
- Be easily angered
- Be often irritable and defensive in response to criticism
- Need to be the one in charge leaving little room for others to take responsibility
- Have a tendency to make sarcastic comments to others, and often behave in similarly insensitive ways
- Tend to operate on the basis of your authority
- Not show adequate concern for the feelings of the people in a work group
- Often develop plans and goals unilaterally
- Not communicate information to people in the group because "they don't need to know"
- Be attentive and responsive to people in higher positions
- Only accept limited input from subordinates
- Develop a hierarchical reporting system with precise and narrow job descriptions
- Generally have little confidence in others
- Believe that force is necessary to produce results
- Depend on others' praise and commendation for their sense of security and feelings of self-worth
- Tend to "beat" others rather than work with them cooperatively
- Operate in a "win-lose" framework
- Tend to select weak subordinates who do not challenge decisions or make you "look bad"

Autocratic has sometimes been admired as a way to "get ahead," to dominate. On the other hand, in the long term it has been shown to be ineffective, producing distrust and resistance, interfering with the larger goals for which leaders are responsible. It is most insidious when we act to seek power, but are blind to our own motives. Like other reactive assumptions, Autocratic alienates others, limits vision, and isolates leaders. It is easy to mistake aspects of Autocratic for a desire for excellence. A desire to excel is in itself admirable. As it is defined here Autocratic is driven by a sense of worth dependent upon comparison, not meeting the highest standard. Excellence attained with others is not part of the world-view encouraged by this assumption, which is frequently linked with power seeking and control.

If you score low

Scoring low on Autocratic is positive. Since high scores are correlated with low scores all across the Creative half of the circle, your scoring low simply means that your full creative self-expression and leadership are probably not being limited by a high need to control others. It suggests that your sense of self does not come through having power over others. A low score does not mean that, in fact, you are leading and creating powerfully. It simply means that you have the absence of a block to empowered leadership. Your scores in the Creative half of the circle will let you know the extent to which your full leadership potential is being expressed.

The Protecting Dimension

The Protecting dimension measures the belief that you can protect yourself and establish a sense of worth through withdrawal, remaining distant, hidden, aloof, cynical, superior, and/or rational.

The Protecting dimension is comprised of three subscales: Arrogance, Critical, and Distance. Each of these is strongly inversely correlated to all the Creative dimensions. Below is a brief summary of what your Protecting results indicate.

If you score high

Scoring high on the Protecting scale suggests that you tend to keep yourself safe by acting aloof and maintaining distance in your relationships. You may also hold back from the risks that might come from fully deploying your creative abilities. Safety means being above it all. This stance can come from an inner lack of confidence, self-doubt, inferiority or it's opposite, superiority. It may well be that you project an air of superiority, needing to be right, find fault, and put others down as a strategy to build yourself up. The need to build yourself up may spring from feelings of self-doubt and vulnerability. Protecting is an internal set of assumptions that link security with distance, and worth with either being small and uninvolved or big and superior.

Internal Assumptions

Internal assumptions are the beliefs you use to organize your identity. They are the inner rules or beliefs that define how you see yourself and your relationship to the world. The internal assumptions often associated with the Protecting dimension include:

- For me to be right, others have to be wrong (and vice versa)
- I am worthwhile if I am right and find the weaknesses in others
- I am valuable because of my superior capability or insight
- I am not good enough
- I am safe and acceptable if I remain small, uninvolved, and avoid risk

Behaviors

Behaviors are the external expression of your internal assumptions. The general behaviors associated with the Protecting dimension include:

- Holding back and watching how situations unfold
- Identifying what is wrong, illogical, or lacking in plans
- Seeing the flaws in others' thinking, speaking, and actions
- Analyzing what is right and what is wrong

Gifts and Strengths

Every Reactive dimension is capable and gifted. When using the strengths of the Protecting dimension you will tend to:

- Cut through complexity and see issues that others miss
- Remain detached and observant when things get emotional
- Take a wider perspective or offer alternative ways to view situations
- Care deeply for a few people or causes
- Protect your active interior or spiritual life
- Be capable of offering a great deal of wisdom

Liabilities

Every Reactive dimension has liabilities and limitations. The down side of the Protecting dimension is the need (conscious or unconscious) to bolster your self-esteem by acting superior, cynical, and faultfinding.

Often these tendencies are intertwined with a strong streak of self-criticism and self-doubt causing you to hold back from making your full contribution, not asserting yourself and playing small. You will need to reflect and get feedback from others about the ways your Protecting dimension manifests.

These intertwining tendencies result in behaviors, which tend toward:

- Acting cold, aloof or uncaring
- Distancing others by your judgements
- Adopting a posture of being superior, more intelligent, better, “right”
- Holding back your creative expression
- Avoiding risk taking
- Diminishing the contribution that you are capable of making
- Holding back your gifts or offering them through a narrow range of rationally distant behaviors

Other people, as a result of some of these behaviors, do not experience you supporting them. They feel judged from a distance rather than known and supported. Consequently, trust can be low.

Related Scores

High scores on this scale are also correlated with reduced scores in the Creative sphere. Pursuing your own vision is often blocked or limited. These behaviors come from a lack of belief in yourself that can translate into a lack of power, assertiveness, creative expression, and risk taking. It can also take the form of being one-down in relationships—not relating from the stance of equality or mutual give and take. Instead you remain at a safe distance and keep a low profile. The net result is that you diminish the contribution that you are capable of making.

You may be limiting your leadership by being reluctant to be vulnerable, make more contact with people, accept feedback, or take the risk of self-expression.

If you score low

Scoring low on this scale means that you may possess many of the gifts described above without the liabilities. It suggests that your Achieving, Relating, Authenticity and Self-Awareness is not held back by this form of Protecting.

Arrogance

Arrogance measures the tendency to project a large ego. It measures behavior that is experienced as superior, egotistical, and self-centered.

If you score high

If you score high on Arrogance you may have some of the following tendencies. You may:

- Act in ways that attract a lot of attention to yourself
- Talk a lot in meetings, taking up too much air time
- Listen poorly because you already know the solution and don’t need input
- Over reach strategically and financially in order to create results that are a testament to your capability
- Be overly concerned with doing big and flashy projects that attract publicity, but may not be in the long-term best interest of the organization
- Talk a lot about yourself and be relatively uninterested in others descriptions of themselves
- Project an air of superiority and/or inapproachability
- Get upset easily when your ideas are challenged
- Get frustrated with groups when they are discussing how to approach a problem because you assume that your way of approaching it is the right way

Leadership requires a strong ego, but when ego becomes over-inflated it can be a problem. Arrogance is very inversely correlated to all the Creative dimensions. It fails to build teamwork because too much attention is required by the leader to truly develop a strong team. Arrogance maintains one-up, one down relationships. In your effort to remain big, others must remain small. Thus, the full capability of the people around you is often not tapped. In the extreme, Arrogance will over-stretch the organization. Highly arrogant leaders have been known to commit the organization to business strategies, in an effort to promote their legacy, that seriously compromised the financial future of the organization.

If you score low

Scoring low on Arrogance is positive. Since high Arrogance scores are correlated with low scores all across the Creative half of the circle, your scoring low simply means that your full creative self-expression and leadership are probably not being limited by a high need to project an air of superiority and arrogance. A low score does not mean that, in fact, you are leading and creating powerfully. It simply means that you have the absence of a block to empowered leadership. Your scores in the Creative half of the circle will let you know the extent to which your full leadership potential is being expressed.

Critical

Critical is a measure of your tendency to take a critical, questioning, and somewhat cynical attitude. It measures the tendency of establishing a sense of worth by finding fault, putting others down, being intellectually or morally superior.

If you score high

If you score high on Critical you may have some of the following tendencies. You may:

- Be dogmatic and rigid
- Be mistrustful of others
- Tend to have a negative, rather than optimistic, attitude
- Be overly critical, tending to blame others when things go wrong
- Focus more on problems than on solutions
- Be more concerned with your personal need for recognition than in building effective work relationships
- Tend to achieve personal feelings of worth by challenging, stifling or “running down” the ideas of others
- Stifle creativity, diminishing the motivation of direct reports and team members
- Make decisions on the basis of the least criticizable idea, putting every suggestion to a rigorous challenge and constantly looking for things that are wrong
- Appear to enjoy arguments and debates
- Often find yourself at the center of organizational conflict
- Use motivation strategies that are built on faultfinding, criticism and blame

Critical, because it is often cloaked in rationality, is difficult to overcome, especially in cultures where individual achievement and appearing smart are important. It has the effect of creating defenses in others. Since it focuses on blame, real performance analysis and systems thinking are often put aside. Combined with an orientation to power seeking, it kills morale and isolates those operating from it.

If you score low

Scoring low on Critical is positive. Since high Critical scores are correlated with low scores all across the Creative half of the circle, your scoring low simply means that your full creative self-expression and leadership are probably not being limited by a high need to find fault with others. It suggests that your sense of self comes from within and not through judging others. This allows you to lead from your own internal authority. A low score does not mean that, in fact, you are leading and creating powerfully. It simply means that you have the absence of a block to empowered leadership. Your scores in the Creative half of the circle will let you know the extent to which your full leadership potential is being expressed.

Distance

Distance is a measure of your tendency to establish a sense of personal worth and security through withdrawal, being superior, and remaining aloof, emotionally distant, and above it all.

If you score high

If you score high on Distance you may have some of the following tendencies. You may:

- Remain emotionally uninvolved
- Appear cold and uncaring
- Maintain strictly rational and professional relationships
- Deal with things on a strictly logical basis
- Remain guarded and invulnerable
- Take an unforgiving posture toward yourself
- Have low self-confidence
- Be tense and uneasy, becoming preoccupied with your own issues and concerns
- Hesitate to make decisions
- Avoid taking on responsibilities
- Often feel a lack of efficacy (the ability to effect change and make a difference in the way things are)
- Try to avoid conflict or decision-making situations
- Chronically delay work and tend to shift responsibilities either up or down the organization
- Abdicate rather than delegate
- Procrastinate in planning activities and making decisions
- Frequently appear forgetful, particularly when risky or potentially unpopular actions should be taken
- Wait until someone else recommends or takes an action so that you don't have to take full responsibility.

The Distance assumption, when dominant, creates persistent patterns of failure and excuse. Even in less pronounced forms, it negates other positive personal and intellectual qualities, creating frustrated colleagues and lost opportunities for leadership and personal growth.

If you score low

Scoring low on Distance is positive. Since high Distance scores are correlated with low scores all across the Creative half of the circle, your scoring low simply means that your full creative self-expression and leadership are probably not being limited by a high need to maintain a safe distance from others or from risky issues. It suggests that your sense of self comes from within and not through separating from others. This allows you to lead from your own internal authority. A low score does not mean that, in fact, you are leading and creating powerfully. It simply means that you have the absence of a block to empowered leadership. Your scores in the Creative half of the circle will let you know the extent to which your full leadership potential is being expressed.

The Complying Dimension

The Complying dimension measures the extent to which you get a sense of self-worth and security by complying with the expectations of others rather than acting on what you intend and want. The Complying dimension is comprised of four subscales: Conservative, Pleasing, Belonging, and Passive. Each of these is inversely correlated with most of the Creative dimensions. The location of each dimension in the circular graph indicates the strength of the correlation. The lower in the circle, the progressively larger the inverse correlations become. Below is a brief summary of what your Complying results indicate.

If you score high

Scoring high on the Complying scale suggests that you tend to relinquish power to others and to the circumstances of life. You may even experience yourself at the mercy of circumstances over which you have little control. You tend to see the world as full of powerful people who can control or protect you. Because of this belief, you tend to submit to those in power and comply with their expectations. You do this to gain safety and win approval. You tend to equate personal worth and security with meeting and living within others' expectations.

Internal Assumptions

Internal assumptions are the beliefs you use to organize your identity. They are the inner rules or beliefs that define how you see yourself and your relationship to the world. The internal assumptions often associated with the Complying dimension include:

- I am okay if people like me
- I am worthy when others approve of me
- I need to live up to others' expectations to succeed
- I can stay safe by supporting others
- The world is a dangerous place. Caution makes me safe
- Loyalty, harmony, and going along to get along protect me from disapproval

Behaviors

Behaviors are the external expression of your internal assumptions. The general behaviors associated with the Complying dimension include:

- Cautiously managing what you do to stay in the good graces of others
- Being a "do-gooder"
- Saying "yes" when you may really want to say "no"
- Calibrating the emotional climate in meetings to see if it is safe to speak
- Double checking with authorities before taking action
- Couching your speech so that others will not have strong emotional responses

Gifts and Strengths

Every Reactive dimension is capable and gifted. When using the strengths of the Complying dimension you will tend towards:

- Recognizing and responding to the needs of others
- Being reliable
- Sensing others' emotions
- Going the extra mile
- Maintaining loyalty
- Upholding traditions
- Being easy to talk to
- Serving others

Liabilities

Every Reactive dimension has liabilities and limitations. The down side of the Complying dimension is the constant need (conscious or unconscious) to meet expectations, please others, belong, be sensitive, protected, needed, liked, and respected. This can lead to helplessness and perceived victimization. The stronger your Complying score, the more power you give away to others, the more you believe that you are not the creator of your life experience, that your efforts do not make much difference, and that you lack the power to create the future you want. Scoring high suggests that you build your sense of worth and security by playing small, complying with others expectations of you, and submitting your wants, needs, and goals to others.

Complying is a key restraining force to developing a creative stance in leadership. It is the assumption that your life be given over, abdicated to others. This assumption is quite different from that of service. Here vision is seen as belonging to others, not to yourself and shared with others. This assumption diminishes not only ambition, but also the right to being one's self. These needs result in behaviors which tend toward:

- Being non-assertive and passive
- Playing by the rules
- Acting so as to fit in
- Submitting to others' needs
- Denying your own aspirations
- Having difficulty acting on your own and preferring to do what you are told
- Frequently seeking advice and counsel from another person before making a decision. This tendency is motivated by a fear of being wrong and a desire to avoid situations containing the risk of failure
- Being self-doubting, overly cautious, meek, and predictable in interpersonal relationships
- Avoiding risk by not advocating your opinions, not setting goals, not engaging conflict, etc.
- Not being aware of your own vision and what you want for your work/life.
- Holding back your creative expression
- Expressing disagreement indirectly (passive-aggressive)

Related Scores

High scores on this scale are also correlated with reduced scores in the Creative sphere, especially on the Achieving and Authenticity scales. Pursuing your own vision and speaking up for what you want is often blocked or limited. These behaviors come from an internal insecurity such as not feeling worthy or loved, feeling rejected, not feeling needed, feeling alone and unprotected.

You may be limiting your leadership by being reluctant to take control, avoiding responsibility or accountability, not speaking out too vocally, or initiating conflict. You see these behaviors as risky and potentially resulting in the disapproval of others.

If you score low

Scoring low on Complying suggests that you have few of the characteristics described above. It further suggests (depending on your scores on other scales) that you may possess many of the strengths of this stance without the liabilities.

Conservative

Conservative measures the extent to which you think and act conservatively, follow procedure, and live within the prescribed rules of the organization with which you are associated. This dimension is neutral to slightly negative in its correlation with the Creative dimensions. This means your score here may be a strength or a weakness depending on your work situation. Look to the other scores in the Complying section to determine if this score is an asset or a liability.

If you score high

If you score high on the Conservative scale, you:

- Operate according to standard rules and procedures
- Manage on the basis of policies, rules and regulations, and procedures
- Motivate by urging conformity to procedures or standards, and reward subordinates on a similar basis
- Are concerned with appearances, dress codes and conformance to the formal relationships established in the organizational chart
- Think conservatively and act in ways prescribed by the organization's culture

Your high score on Conservative may or may not be a problem. Scoring high is ideally suited for bureaucratic organizations and/or in professions where adherence to procedure is an essential part of the job. In these situations, scoring high may be an asset or at least, not a liability. Look at your score on Belonging. If it too is high, then it suggests that your conservative ways are problematic. In short, you are living and leading in too small a box—a box determined by convention and your need to belong—and not being able to think and lead outside the box.

If you score low

Scoring low on Conservative is generally positive. Your scoring low simply means that your full creative self-expression and leadership are probably not being limited by a high need to act conservatively. It suggests that you are able to think outside the box and that your security is not tied to conventional ways of doing things. This may allow you to lead from your own internal authority (if other scores in the Reactive half of the circle are low). A low score does not mean that, in fact, you are leading and creating powerfully. It simply means that you have the absence of this particular block to empowered leadership. Your scores in the Creative half of the circle will let you know the extent to which your full leadership potential is being expressed.

Pleasing

Pleasing measures your need to seek others' support and approval in order to feel secure and worthwhile as a person. People with strong needs for approval tend to base their degree of self-worth on their ability to gain others' favor and confirmation. For these types of people, avoiding personal rejection is paramount. As a result, they are likely to do things that will keep them in good graces with others. They may be overly generous, act friendly all the time, be overly sympathetic, or generally submit to the wishes of others.

If you score high

If you have a high score on the Pleasing scale, some of the following may apply to you. You:

- Focus on how people react to you
- Will be quite sensitive to criticism or disapproval
- May be so worried about your superiors' acceptance of your ideas that you limit your creativity or assertively put forth your ideas
- May set goals to please others or for the sake of appearances
- Usually avoid anything that is controversial or unpopular because you see conflict and controversy as unacceptable
- Generally set low performance standards for subordinates
- Get along in your organization by doing what is expected
- May try to build support for yourself by doing little favors, or by looking the other way when things go wrong

While seeking approval is not in itself unhealthy (we all need some affirmation), this assumption constitutes a persistent pattern, making self-worth dependent upon others. It is important insofar as it blocks full realization of potential for creative action.

If you score low

Scoring low on Pleasing is positive. Since high scores are correlated with low scores all across the Creative half of the circle, your scoring low simply means that your full creative self-expression and leadership are probably not being limited by a high need to please others. It suggests that your sense of self comes from within and not through pleasing others. This allows you to lead from your own internal authority. A low score does not mean that, in fact, you are leading and creating powerfully. It simply means that you have the absence of a block to empowered leadership. Your scores in the Creative half of the circle will let you know the extent to which your full leadership potential is being expressed.

Belonging

Belonging measures your need to conform, follow the rules, and meet the expectations of those in authority. This scale measures the extent to which you establish a sense of worth and security from belonging to the group and living by the norms, rules, and values of that group. It measures the extent to which you go along to get along; thereby, compressing the full extent of your creative power into culturally acceptable boxes.

If you score high

If you score high on the Belonging scale, you:

- Tend to be very respectful
- Are steady, reliable and agreeable, but often lack spontaneity
- Avoid conflict
- Operate according to standard rules and procedures
- May resist change and innovation
- May have strong fears of failure
- May lack aggressiveness, find it difficult to act decisively
- Tend to operate on the basis of policies, rules and regulations, and procedures, thus producing a bureaucratic climate that reinforces the status quo
- Motivate by urging conformity to procedures or standards, and reward subordinates on a similar basis
- Often set relatively low risk goals
- May be overly concerned with appearance, dress codes, and conformance to the formal relationships established in the organizational chart
- Have a strong orientation to the past and "the way things have always been done"
- Look to your supervisors for direction and leadership
- Be an excellent follower and rarely rock the boat by taking forceful, risky, or spontaneous action
- Often delay action until it is clear what the boss needs or wants
- Accept higher management's goals and standards without question, and rigidly follow these standards once they have been established

Belonging charts a safe course. It is ideally suited for bureaucratic organizations and environments in which there is little turbulence. It enables you to exist within the rules without questioning them, to value tradition and conformity. One of its chief virtues is being inoffensive. However, this internal assumption prevents testing your full potential. It sacrifices the courage of leadership for bland comfort. In turbulence, it can lead to defensiveness and depression as the rules upon which it has relied no longer apply.

If you score low

Scoring low on Belonging is positive. Since high Belonging scores are correlated with low scores all across the Creative half of the circle, your scoring low simply means that your full creative self-expression and leadership are probably not being limited by a high need to conform to group norms. It suggests that your sense of self comes from within and not through taking up membership in a group. This allows you to lead from your own internal authority. A low score does not mean that, in fact, you are leading and creating powerfully. It simply means that you have the absence of a block to empowered leadership. Your scores in the Creative half of the circle will let you know the extent to which your full leadership potential is being expressed.

Passive

Passive measures the degree to which you give away your power to others and to circumstances outside your control. It is a measure of the extent to which you believe that you are not the creator of your life experience, that your efforts do not make much difference, and that you lack the power to create the future you want.

If you score high

Scoring high suggests that you build your sense of worth and security by playing small, complying with others' expectations of you, and submitting your wants, needs, and goals to others or to the group.

People scoring high on Passive have some of the following tendencies. These tendencies get triggered more often when you engage people higher up in the organization. You:

- Are passive
- Lack passion or if you have it you do not show it
- Have difficulty acting on your own and prefer to do what you are told
- Frequently seek advice and counsel from another person before making a decision. This tendency is motivated by a fear of being wrong and a desire to avoid situations containing the risk of failure
- Are self-doubting, overly cautious, meek, and predictable in interpersonal relationships
- Look to your supervisors for direction and leadership
- Are an excellent follower and rarely rock the boat by taking forceful, risky, or spontaneous action
- Often delay action until it is clear what the boss needs or wants
- Accept higher management's goals and standards without question, and rigidly follow these standards once they have been established
- Avoid risk by not advocating your opinions, not setting goals, not engaging in conflict
- Have issues with people (especially people higher up), but are unwilling to risk discussing those issues with them directly
- Pretend to be on board and supportive when in reality you have deep concerns about the organization's direction
- May be very angry at authority which only comes out in offline conversations or in passive-aggressive episodes

- Are not aware of your own vision and what you want for your work/life
- Remain indecisive
- Do not take up your authority in the world

Passive is a key restraining force to developing a creative stance in leadership. It is the assumption that our lives are to be given over, abdicated to others. This assumption is quite different from that of service. In the Passive orientation, vision is seen as belonging to others, not to ourselves and shared with others. This assumption diminishes not only creative achievement, but the right to be yourself.

If you score low

Scoring low on Passive is positive. Since high Passive scores are correlated with low scores all across the Creative half of the circle, your scoring low simply means that your full creative self-expression and leadership are probably not being limited by a high need to submit to powers that are outside you. It suggests that your sense of self comes from within and not through fitting yourself into the mold that others expect of you. This allows you to lead from your own internal authority. A low score does not mean that, in fact, you are leading and creating powerfully. It simply means that you have the absence of a block to empowered leadership. Your scores in the Creative half of the circle will let you know the extent to which your full leadership potential is being expressed.

“Lead. Do what is right and what is needed. And do so humbly. Then let's talk about leadership.”

~David Spach

Reactive-Creative Scale

Reactive-Creative Scale reflects the degree of balance between the Creative dimensions and the Reactive dimensions. The percentile score here gives you a sense of how you compare to other managers with respect to the amount of energy you put into reactive versus creative behavior. It suggests the degree to which your leadership, relationships, and goal oriented behavior are coming out of a creative or reactive orientation. It suggests the degree to which your self concept and inner motivation comes from within or is determined by external expectations, rules, or conditions.

If you score high

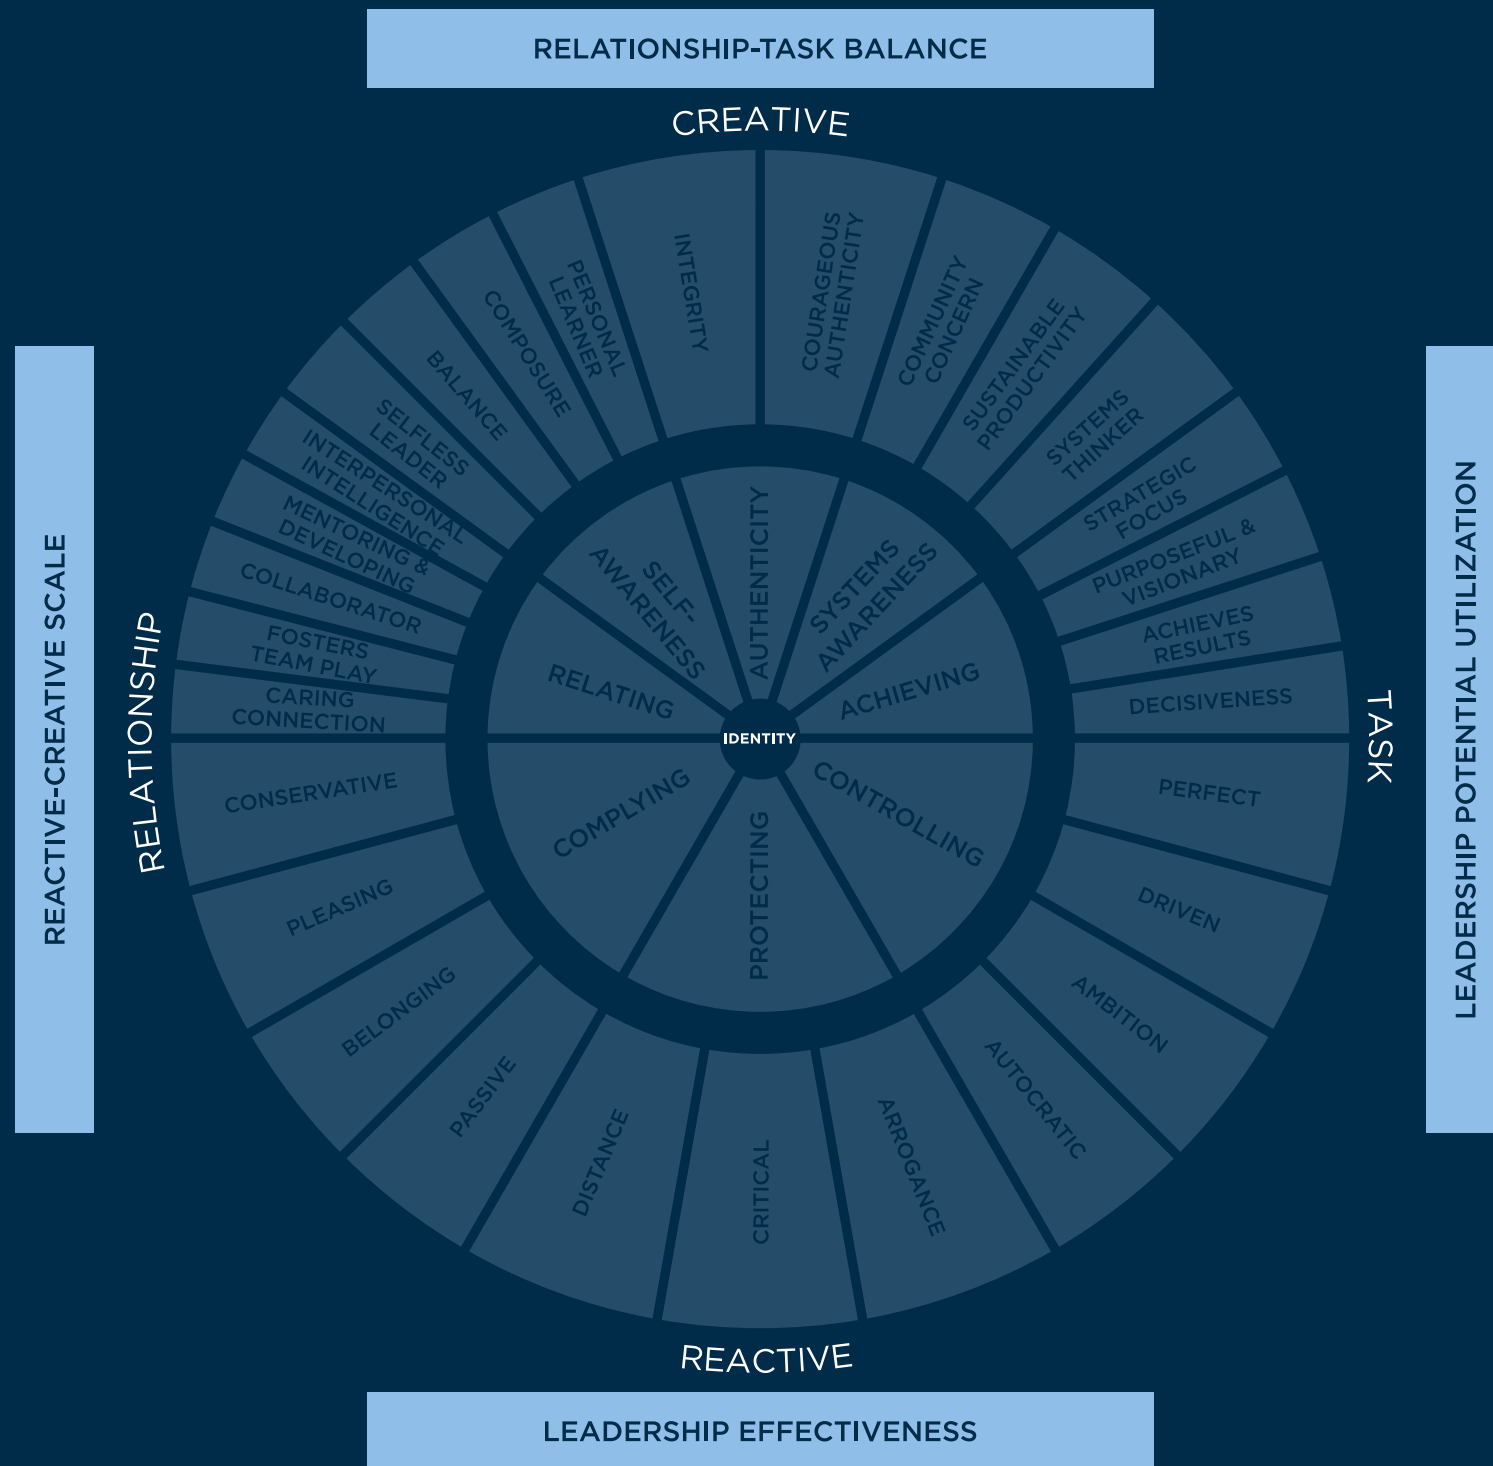

A high score suggests that you live, relate, work and learn primarily from a creative orientation. This means that your focus is on creating—bringing into being—what you most want. Your focus is on a vision of the results you care about. Your motivation is that of being pulled into action out of a natural curiosity, desire, commitment, and even love for the future you are moving toward. You go at life with a “play to win” orientation (where winning is not focused on beating someone else, but bringing out the best within you). This is very different from a reactive, “trying not to lose” orientation. You move toward what you want more often than you move away from what you don’t want. Highly successful and creative people operate from this orientation most of the time. Research suggests it is highly related to high achievement, goal attainment, quality relationships, personal growth, and good health.

A high score suggests that you have moved on from organizing a sense of self-worth through external measures. It suggests that you are internally motivated and self-authoring. Your self worth is configured from within. You create and relate, not to prove yourself, but because it expresses who you are and what you value.

If you score low

Scoring low on Reactive-Creative Scale does not mean that you are an unsuccessful person. It does suggest that there is another way of operating that results in higher performance and higher fulfillment. Your low score suggests that you live, relate, work and/or learn more in reaction to what you don’t want than out of bringing into being what you do want. You play not to lose—avoid falling short, failing, or losing face. You move away from what you are trying to avoid. Your primary focus is reducing threats or eliminating problems. You tend to follow someone else’s vision or live up to their expectations instead of pursuing your own in a collaborative way. The primary motivating emotional energy for taking action is some form of anxiety or inner conflict. Research suggests that this orientation is highly related to remaining at a current level of performance, crisis management, relationship struggles, stymied personal growth, and lower levels of health.

Your low score suggests that you scored high on the Reactive dimensions above. Each of these dimensions is a different way of establishing your identity, self-worth and security externally. This means that much of your creating and relating activity comes from an inner need to be seen as an important, valuable person. As yet you have not fully learned how to get this from within. Whether you know it or not, a low score here suggests that your actions are more determined by external expectations and cultural conditions than by your own internal sense of who you are and what you want to contribute.

Relationship-Task Balance

Relationship-Task Balance measures the degree of balance you show between the achievement competencies and the relationship competencies. It is a measure of the over, under or balanced development of either half of the equation (the people half or the task half) that makes for great leadership.

If you score high

Leaders today need competencies in both the ability to achieve and the ability to form effective, growth enhancing, and synergistic relationships. Scoring high suggests that you are developing both. It is possible to have high scores in this dimension when both your Achieving and Relating scores are low. This would suggest that you have a balanced capability with both, but neither is a strength. If however, your scores in both are high and your balance score is high it means that your leadership offers a unique blend of high achievement and high people development. This is rare. It makes for the most effective form of leadership.

If you score low

Scoring low means that task and relationship are out of balance. That is, one is higher than the other is. The greater the imbalance in your scores, the lower your score will be for Relationship-Task Balance. Low scores suggest an imbalance in your leadership development.

It may be that you have higher scores in the Achieving domain and relatively lower scores in the Relating domain. If this is the case you may act as if quality relationships are just “soft, touchy-feely fluff” and not that relevant to the hard world of competitive business. You may be good at hard and not so good at soft. Research clearly suggests that such a stance is not as effective as valuing both. You may have spent the bulk of your career developing technical or business skills, and while you value relationships and know how important it is to develop the human side of business, you lack the skills. Either way, scoring high in the achieving domain and low in the relationship domain suggests that developing the ability to foster teamwork and bring out the best in those around you can enhance your leadership. Look at the strengths in the Relating domain. Which ones do you need to develop? Look at the internal assumptions section. Are any assumptions blocking the development of your relationship skills?

It may be that you have a lower score in the Achieving domain than you do in the Relating domain. If this is the case you may be over-emphasizing relationships at the expense of achieving results. You may be too soft. You may be compromising performance in the name of maintaining harmony. You may need to focus more on goal attainment, and/or confront issues in a more direct way. Look at the strengths listed in the Achieving domain. Which ones do you need to develop? Look at the internal assumptions section. Are any assumptions blocking the development of your ability to focus on high achievement?

Leadership Potential Utilization

Leadership Potential Utilization is a bottom line measure. It looks at all the dimensions measured above and compares that overall score to the other managers who have taken this survey. It sorts through all the high and low scores to answer the question, “So, in the end, how am I doing?”

If you score high

Scoring high here simply means that when all the dimensions are taken together, the strengths will outweigh the weaknesses. You cannot score high on this dimension unless there is significant strength in the Creative dimensions and relatively low scores in the Reactive dimensions. You also score higher here if you have good balance between people competencies and task competencies. It means that you are leading and functioning in very effective ways and in ways that promote high fulfillment and sustainability. Congratulations!

If you score low

Scoring low suggests that when all the dimensions are taken together, the weaknesses outweigh the strengths. It means that there is more energy going in the reactive direction than in the creative and/or that there is an imbalance in people and task competencies. It means that you are blocked from the full expression of your potential. It means that your greatness lies in waiting within you—it is there, just not fully available.

Of course low scores here can mean a lot of things. It could be as simple and as difficult as being in a job/career that does not express whom you are. It could mean you are new in a job and have a lot to learn. It could mean that you are in transition, the old fires are dying out and the new one’s have not yet been lit. Low scores do not mean that you are not a leader or capable of leading. They do suggest that, for whatever reason, your leadership is not coming out. You may want to reflect deeply on what these results mean for you. Be careful not to blame others or your environment as a way of letting yourself off the hook. Be careful about blaming yourself for constraints that are in your environment. Scoring low suggests that you have some difficult truths to face. Take heart in knowing that all great people have had to face themselves similarly. The truth will set you free, but first you have some work to do.

Leadership Effectiveness

Leadership Effectiveness measures your perceived level of overall effectiveness as a leader. It is a summary measure and is a way of answering the question, “So in the end, how am I doing?”

Leadership Effectiveness (as seen by others) has been shown to be significantly correlated to business outcomes such as ROI, employee job satisfaction, employee engagement, turnover, etc. Research suggests that a high score on Leadership Effectiveness is associated with strong bottom line performance and low scores are, likewise, associated with poor business performance.

The questions that make up this scale are:

- I am satisfied with the quality of leadership that this leader provides.
- This leader is the kind of leader that others should aspire to become.
- This leader is an example of an ideal leader.
- This leader’s leadership helps this organization to thrive.
- Overall, this leader provides very effective leadership.

If you score high

Your Leadership Effectiveness score is highly correlated to all the scores in the upper half of the circle. So, if you have strong scores in the upper half of the circle (and lower scores in the bottom half of the circle) your effectiveness score should be high.

If you score low

If your Leadership Effectiveness score is low, look first to the lower half of the circle to understand what might be causing this. Then, look to the upper half of the Circle to explore what you want to improve.

LEADERSHIP DEVELOPMENT PLANNING™

Download an editable version here

LEADERSHIP
CIRCLE®

NAME:

Leadership Development Plan

DATE:

INTRODUCTION

This plan lays out an overall intention for my own leadership, as well as improvement goals I am declaring for and pursuing.

The goals are intended to be realistic and practical. At the same time, they represent a stretch for me as a leader. They will help me to deepen my own approach to leadership and strengthening my positive impact on others.

I will regularly review this plan and keep it updated to ensure it reflects my latest thinking, and that I am implementing against it and applying my learning.

BACKGROUND ON MY LEADERSHIP

I've based my development work on insights gained through my Leadership Circle Profile assessment, on feedback I've received in other formal and informal ways, and on my own candid introspection.

Key insights about my leadership that will inform my actions and my ongoing development:

MY VISION

Ultimately, my development is guided by a grand, multi-year vision of who I want to be as a leader. As I move toward my One Big Thing, I will step more fully into my vision, and perhaps illuminate it further from a new perspective.

My vision of what I'm trying to bring to pass through my leadership shows the following characteristics:

1. Personal. This vision comes within me, and it's a picture of how I see my own purpose manifesting itself into my future.
2. Specific. I call it out so that when this vision is achieved, I will know it and others will know it.
3. Strategic. Not limited by the constraints of current reality. Sets direction to enable the organization to excel into the future.
4. Lofty. This vision appeals to my deepest values, highest aspirations and personal sense of purpose – and those of the people whom I lead.
5. Collective. This vision calls for me to influence and be influenced, to distill and refine, creating a shared sense of purpose and direction.

In creating my vision, I ask myself:

- What would I do or create if I could – if I knew I could not fail and would not be fired?
- What is it that most wants and needs to happen in the system in which I find myself?
- What will exist in two years that does not exist now? In five years?
- Where will I be, who will I become, and what will I have accomplished?

My current articulation of my vision:

WHY MY VISION IS IMPORTANT TO ME	WHY IT'S IMPORTANT TO THE ORGANIZATION/ BUSINESS

Over the next 3-9 months, I will focus on a specific overarching goal and selected behaviors in my leadership development. This will go hand-in-hand with a Vision I hold in my mind for what I want my leadership to be long-term, and an awareness of how, if I'm not mindful, I may get in my own way.

MY “ONE BIG THING” GOAL

My One Big Thing goal is a statement about my leadership that, if it became strongly true, would unlock my leadership and take it to a new level. Attaining this would materially change others' experience of me as a leader, and my positive impact in my leadership. It is aspirational, representing a stretch for me, which is why I'm declaring for it and inviting others to help me via ongoing feedback.

Word the goal using the format, “As a leader, I [articulate the characteristic you want to exhibit].”

For examples of One Big Thing goals, click here

For brevity and clarity, attempt to make this goal statement in less than 10-12 words.

MY ONE BIG THING GOAL	WHY THIS IS IMPORTANT TO ME (impact on business results, my own leadership, personal life, etc.)
As a leader, I...

Key approaches, experiments, or steps I'll take toward my One Big Thing goal (practices, habits, rituals, shifts, etc.):

MY “ONE BIG LIABILITY”

Each of us has Reactive tendencies that, unless we are conscious and deliberate, can interrupt our effectiveness by commanding energy and attention. I ask myself, “What pattern of thought/behavior do I exhibit that, if I let it go, would free me to take my leadership to a new level?” My best current articulation of that One Big Liability is the following:

ONE BIG LIABILITY STATEMENT	HOW THIS LIMITS MY EFFECTIVENESS AS A LEADER
I have a tendency to...

SPECIFIC BEHAVIORS

I will focus on one behavior to START or do more, and one to STOP or do less. They are not the only behaviors I will modify in pursuit of my One Big Thing goal and preventing my One Big Liability from derailing me, but I will give these two behaviors special focus and hold myself accountable for them.

Capture your goals by just stating the action phrase in the present tense. For brevity and clarity, attempt to make this goal statement in less than 10-12 words.

START BEHAVIOR Creative side, observable, new emphasis for me	STOP BEHAVIOR Reactive side, observable, gets in the way
Example: Speaks up when he has concerns, even when it makes people uncomfortable	Example: Blames others when things don't go well

TRACKING MY DEVELOPMENT PROGRESS

I will track my progress toward achieving my One Big Thing Goal and identified behaviors by actively soliciting feedback from others who are in a position to observe and inform me.

I'm identifying an “Accountability Circle” of 5-8 trusted individuals on whom I will rely to give me feedback on my One Big Thing and behaviors. This may include some of those I recruited as raters for my 360 profile. These are people whose opinion I respect, who are in a position to observe my leadership behavior on a regular basis, and who are willing to provide me with candid feedback on what they see.

- NAME: _____ EMAIL: _____
- NAME: _____ EMAIL: _____
- NAME: _____ EMAIL: _____
- NAME: _____ EMAIL: _____
- NAME: _____ EMAIL: _____
- NAME: _____ EMAIL: _____
- NAME: _____ EMAIL: _____
- NAME: _____ EMAIL: _____

I will discuss my overall intent and specific goals with these people and ask them to provide me with frequent feedback on how I'm doing.

Noteworthy accomplishments or additional insights based on feedback that I receive:

USING THIS LEADERSHIP DEVELOPMENT PLAN

I will:

- Regularly review this plan (at least monthly) to ensure I'm acting and learning to improve my leadership.
- Update the plan to reflect my most current thinking and to record the progress that I am making.
- Share the plan with others who can provide additional insights and feedback (e.g., my Accountability Circle, my boss, my coach).

Suggested Readings

Click Here

Poetry References

Bly, Robert. News of the Universe: Poems of Twofold Consciousness. Sierra Club Books, 1980.
 Machado, Antonio. Selected Poems and Prose. White Pine Press, 1983.
 Oliver, Mary. American Primitive. Little Brown & Company, 1978.
 _____. Dream Work. Atlantic Monthly Press, 1986.
 _____. House of Light. 1991
 Rilke, Rainer Maria. Selected Poems of Rainer Maria Rilke. Robert Bly, trans. Harper & Row, 1981.
 Walcott, Derek. Collected Poems 1948-1984. The Noonday Press, 1986.
 Whyte, David. Songs for Coming Home. Many Rivers Press, 1989
 _____. Where Many Rivers Meet. Many Rivers Press, 1990.
 _____. Fire in the Earth. Many Rivers Press, 1991.
 _____. The House of Belonging. Many Rivers Press, 1997.

Web Site

www.LeadershipCircle.com

Download Interactive PDF

